he deserved its censure; nor will I speak of the measure of contempt that would justly follow any man who should refuse to dedicate cheerfully, in a moment of immediate danger, his property or his life to his country's defence. I know that this power has been exercised in some cases where censure was not demanded; but in others, that we should never recommend as examples. It is against the doctrine that holds such seizures of private property, by an officer of the army, against the will of the owner, to be lawful, that I protest. If it can be justified in a court of justice in this country, the whole Government is a mockery, and every man a slave. I cannot reflect, without emotions that I cannot suppress, on the miserable slavery under which we live, if such a power is to be tolerated. Who, sir, is to be the judge of the necessity that shall justify it? If an officer of the army, then, is he only bound to exercise his judgment as a military man, and he stands, on every analogous principle of law, irresponsible and justified. Will any gentleman here, of that profession of which I am an humble member, show us a precedent of such a justification? Will he let us know the name of an English lawyer that ever put his name to such a plea? Will he produce a record from the whole history of British jurisprudence, where it can be found? Such a point was never suffered to be debated before a judge in England. No writer, since the days of James II. has asserted it, and no lawyer there would defile the record of a court with such a defence. We have recognized the illegality of these impressments, in numerous acts for the relief of officers. The act for the relief of General Swartwout, even recites the judgment of the Supreme Court in New York against him, for the violation of right that he committed by order of his superior officer, in a case of impressment. The records of that court abound with the vindication of that principle in every free Government, which protects us from the arm or the discretion of military power, in every form and disguise. If such a discretion is vested in a commanding general, the discretion is not traversable in a court of justice. He must be the sole judge of the necessity, and every man's property is held at the mercy of his sword. If his property is subject to military discretion, then is his person also. I know of no distinction in principle between the securities that we hold for both. The security of life and liberty, as well as the enjoyment of property, stand on the same great constitutional principles. The only vote I ever gave in this House, that I have regretted, was at the first session I came here. It was to indemnify an aid-de-camp of General Pike, who, even by order of his superior officer, arrested several citizens of the State of New York. I have voted for no indemnities since, where the personal liberty of any man has been violated; and I wish every act of that sort was stricken from the statute book. What, sir, do we mean, when we speak of that free system of British laws that our fathers brought with them here, if we have only lived to hold our property at the mercy of an agent of this Government that wears its tinsel on his shoulder? Is it an idle delusion only, when we look to Magna Charta as the security of every British subject against the encroachments of his sovereign? I thought it was our boast and pride, as freemen, too, that no man in this country should be deprived of his life or liberty, or despoiled of his property, without the judgment of his peers—the trial by jury. If an officer can take my property, of any sort, at his discretion, he may take my money with it—and if mine, my neighbor's. And if he can do this in any shape, or to any extent, he may levy a contribution on all who are within the reach of his sword, and enforce it at the point of the bayonet. If Government has not provided support for its armies, shall they live on the people, and measure their rights by the length of their swords? It is worse in practice than the levies of ship-money under the race of the Stuarts. There was at least the consolation there, that the warrant came from the hand of a civil officer of the Government; but with us, we should find the authority of the precept in the name of an adjutant general. The Stuarts only called in the soldiery when the spirit of an English freeman resisted the claim; but we should first realize our slavery by finding the bayonet at our doors. The King of England, with all his army at Hounslow, and all his navy at London Bridge, would not dare to execute an order for impressment of private property in the city of London. If the Minister should assert such a prerogative in the House of Commons, he could not hold his place an hour; and the sovereign who should dare to maintain him in it, would not wear his crown a day. It has already been tried in England. This doctrine cost the first Stuart his head, the last his crown, and the indignant spirit of England drove him a vagabond to the continent, to beg his bread at the Courts of Europe.

The doctrine that unlimited power might be assumed for purposes of public utility, was the maxim of James I; and this monarch went one step in that path of tyranny beyond the examples that he found in the days of the Roman Republic. The consul sometimes contrived to invest himself with the same power, but he always took the precaution to obtain it under the form of a decree of the Senate. The English despot took it without consulting his Parliament at all. It was about the latter end of the days of the Roman Republic, that the maxim sprung up, that has been thrown out on this floor. I heard it once offered before, in another place, where it became my professional duty to notice it. Silent leges inter arma. It is worth an inquiry, in any Government that pretends to freedom, to trace this sentiment to its origin. It is not to be found in the English Common Law, and will never be sanctioned in this country, until we have nothing left that is worth protecting. It was first avowed under the consulship of Pompey—then become sole consul, and virtually dictator. The time of this consulship, in which this convenient maxim was first started, is deserving of some attention. He was sole consul only four years before he was himself assassinated, and eight years before the Triumvirate of Antony, Lepidus, and Octavius Cæsar, was established—the same patriotic Triumvirate that partitioned the Roman power among themselves. Octavius Cæsar took the West, Antony the East, and Lepidus took Italy, for their shares of the Government. This celebrated conspiracy against the liberties of Rome was successfully maintained until they quarrelled among themselves in the distribution of the spoil, and the most ambitious of them all defeated his last co-patriot at the battle of Actium, and established the Augustan dynasty on the ruins of the Republic. Surely, sir, there is nothing in the character of the times in which this maxim was started, that recommends it very highly to our imitation here. Its first inception is to be found in the oration of Cicero in behalf of Milo; and there were some circumstances in that celebrated trial (which took place in the year of Pompey's sole consulship) that are worth our notice, too, when we are about to try the value of such a sentiment in a free country. Milo's trial was not had before the Prætor, nor under the ordinary laws of Rome. Pompey created a tribunal for the sole purpose. It was of the nature of a special commission, and the friends of Clodius, whose favor Pompey courted, were gratified with the trial of Milo under this new form of justice in that commonwealth. The whole proceeding was a scandalous mockery, and the trial was conducted, and the judgment rendered under an ex post facto ordinance. The hall, too, was filled by the soldiery, which had been stationed around the seats of the Judges. The soldiery—which Cicero, in that oration, quailing under the power, if not the eye of Pompey, pusillanimously alluded to by the less offensive name of comitatus-attendants! While he designated the whole proceeding by the mere cowardly terms of novi judicii nova forma, the recreant advocate apologized to the minions of power whom he addressed, for his embarrassment in the presence of the soldiery that surrounded them. It was on that occasion, and in such a situation, before such a tribunal, and in times like these, that, instead of denouncing the whole proceeding as a disgrace upon the Republic, he basely flattered the ear of Pompey with a sentiment that is truly grateful to the ear of every tyrant—silent leges inter arma. Deservedly as we may admire him as an orator and a scholar, his cowardice as an advocate has left an indelible reproach upon his memory. He basely truckled to the power of Pompey, when he was perhaps the only man that could have roused the Roman people from the lethargy that precedes despotism every where. He shrunk from his duty, as a recreant—and, afraid to follow Pompey, or to oppose Cæsar, he fled from Rome, and fell a victim, at last, to the very Triumvirate that put his principles into practice; and, when overtaken by the emissaries of Antony, who proscribed him, meanly thrust out his head from his coach,* and tamely bowed his neck to receive the stroke of his assassin. The execrable despotism that followed, is the best commentary that history can furnish to illustrate this maxim, by which tyranny has sustained itself every where; and when the people of this country shall be prepared to tolerate it here, they will have become the fit vassals of the first imperial despot that will consent to disgrace his new-born dynasty by condescending to rule over such a set of debased and ignominious slaves.

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, who said, as I was the means of introducing the unfortunate Latin maxim to which the gentleman from New York has referred, I am glad to have the authority of that gentleman, that, at least, it was Ciceronian; and, therefore, could not be bad Latin. I feel bound to explain the sense in which I introduced it. I mentioned it not as sanctioning any of those doctrines which the gentleman from New York has impugned this day. Far from it, sir; and I have a good right to say this; because, unlike that gentleman, I never did vote for a bill to indemnify an officer, having either one or two epaulettes on his shoulder, for violating the most sacred rights of an American citizen. I never did, and never will, so help me God! I introduced the quotation only as declaring what I supposed had been a fact—done flagrante bello—done ex necessitate rei—and necessity, sir, does not stop to argue even with the gentleman from New York, rhetorician and logician as he is. But does not that gentleman perceive that all his argument against the amendment, goes equally against the whole bill? That it is as good against the cart and horse as it is against the slave? Does he not perceive—if he will permit me in my homely vernacular to say so—that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander? Sir, it was this which occasioned me to move, the other day, that the Committee should rise. I gave up that motion at the request of an honorable gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GURLEY] who was desirous, at that time, of addressing the Committee; and I would now again have moved it, but for the same desire on the part of the gentleman from South Carolina, (to whose courtesy I am indebted for the opportunity of now addressing you) with a view of having the bill re-committed. The Committee of Claims—I say it with no disrespect—have not, in my opinion, taken a proper view of the subject. When this bill was first introduced from that Committee, I did not read their report. I do not read the reports of Committees; and, far less, all that immense mass of trash which is heaped upon our tables, and printed by our order—for whose benefit I cannot tell; certainly not for ours, nor for that of the People. I do not mean sir, to apply the term “trash” to the report of the Committee of Claims; but I did not read that report: and I am not ashamed to say that I do not read the reports. Sir, I subscribe most heartily to the doctrine maintained by the gentleman from New York, and I do not mean to pronounce a palinodia, when I say this. I will, as heartily as he can, defend the right of every citizen of this country against any hand but the hand of the law; and that, after its act has been authorized by the verdict of twelve good and lawful men. I concur with him in the sentiment, that the right of property is not only as dear as the right of life and of liberty, but from policy it ought to be even dearer, because it is at this right that the blow of the oppressor will always be levelled. The tyrant will let his subjects go about with their throats uncut, so long as he can find the means of answering his exorbitant demands, by touching their property; so long as he can do this, there is no fear that, like Cicero, we shall thrust our heads out of our coach windows (such of us as have any) that they may be cut off by the cimatars of his satraps. I now hold, and always have held, the doctrine which the gentleman from New York has so ably and so eloquently enforced—ably and eloquently, as was shewn by the profound attention with which it was heard. That, sir, is a barometer which never fails. I will not incur the risk of forfeiting the favor which the House has been so good as to extend to me, in every instance, when I have addressed them. The floor is the right of another gentleman—from South Carolina. After we have heard the gentleman from South Carolina, and such other gentlemen as now wish to address the Committee, I shall move that the Committee rise, either that this matter may be put at rest forever, or that the bill may be recommitted. I will also remind gentlemen that this is a private claim, and, by the strangest rule that ever was heard of, we have given to private bills two sixths of our time, and as much more as they can get in the scramble. I will say no more.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that no member of the Committee could regret more sincerely than he did, the extent to which this discussion had been carried, and the time which had already been consumed in it. He believed, also, that the general sentiment of the Committee would sustain him in the declaration, that there was nothing in the intrinsic merits of the question before them that required or justified a debate so protracted. Entertaining these views, he had intended to have abstained altogether from any participation in the discussion; and he certainly should not have abandoned his original intention, but for the very extraordinary course pursued by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORRS] who had just addressed the Committee. He felt that he was called upon to meet the argument of that gentleman, in the only way it was proper to meet it, by exposing its drift and tendency, and its obvious bearing upon a question which was not the proper subject of discussion in this Hall. And, said Mr. M'D., I think I can make out so plain a case, that every member of the Committee will, with me, be disposed to ask, whence this labored argument against military usurpation and military power, on this question, and at this particular time? The gentleman must underrate the common sense of this Committee very greatly, if he supposes that the drift of his declamation on this extraneous and irrelevant topic—to say nothing of its design—is not as well understood by every body else as it is by himself. The argument of the gentleman is the more worthy of particular notice, and exposure, from its utter inconsistency, not only with his concession that the claim for the cart and horse is well founded, but with the whole course of his legislative conduct in reference to claims of this description.

Now, Sir, after all that he has said on the subject of military usurpation, and the necessity of resisting claims growing out of such usurpation, the Committee will, no doubt, be surprised to learn, that the gentleman himself has gone farther than any member of Congress, in supporting claims founded upon that very species of military usurpation, which he now so emphatically denounces. Yes, Sir, he has been instrumental in drawing from the National Treasury, nearly I believe, half a million of dollars. I do not recollect the exact amount of the Niagara claims—to indemnify individuals on the Northern frontier of New York, for injuries they sustained from the seizure and occupation, and actual destruction of their property, by the arm of military power. When the gentleman was urging this House to grant indemnification to those sufferers, did we hear him declaiming so eloquently upon the danger of military usurpations? Did he then tell us that there was an end of civil liberty, because the property of the citizen of New York was converted to military use, and the very mansions, nay, entire towns, involved in ruin, by their military occupation? Did he then maintain the strange doctrine which he does now, that these military usurpations should be discountenanced, and put down, by the singular expedient of refusing to grant to the sufferers any indemnification for the injuries inflicted upon them? No, Sir. Although these claims grew out of military seizures and trespasses, infinitely more extensive and dangerous than the impressment upon which this claim is founded, the gentleman did not utter a single word upon the subject of military usurpation.

And yet, sir, at this time, in the discussion of a claim much more clearly maintainable, upon the very same principle, he deems it a fit occasion to bring to the view of the committee, in artful connexion with the impressment in question, all that is odious in the military usurpations of antiquity, and in the civil despotism of modern times. What possible bearing can these references have upon the merits of this claim? Why is the dictatorship of Pompey, and the imperial dictatorship of the second Cæsar, dragged into a discussion with which they have no legitimate connexion? Is it because General Jackson was the officer within whose command this impressment was made, and the defence of New Orleans the purpose to which this military usurpation was consecrated? Is it to impress upon the nation the danger of entrusting its liberties, in any degree, to the guardianship of a “Military Chieftain?”

Mr. Chairman, I had indulged an earnest hope that the appropriate legislative business of Congress would not be embarrassed and delayed by the introduction of any allusions, whether open or disguised, to the great and agitating question which now engrosses the attention of the People of this country. For my own part, I had resolved to suppress any remark, however applicable to the question, which might be discussed here, which could give rise to any thing like party excitement. But sir, when I hear a strain of declamation, having no possible bearing upon the question under discussion, and of which the evident scope and tendency is to produce a political effect, both here and elsewhere, I am constrained to ask the gentleman from New York, why it is, that the shock which civil liberty would sustain, and the countenance which military usurpation would derive from the recognition of claims similar to the present, did not occur to him, when the conduct of other officers was involved, and how it happens that this sudden horror at the idea of a military impressment has seized him, when the conduct of General Jackson is incidentally involved?

Having briefly shown the tendency of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, I leave it to this committee, and to the country, to determine what was their design.

Amongst the admirable and appropriate historical analogies with which we have been favored, we have been told by the gentleman from New York that the impressment of property under the emergencies of the military service, in time of war—emergencies no less imperious than the obligation to defend and save the Republic—is much more incompatible with civil liberty than the lawless exaction of ship-money, which marked the tyranny of the English Stuart: for, in that case, it seems the People had the consolation of reflecting that they were plundered by the hand of civil power. Is it true, that there is any thing in the nature of civil power, that can either consecrate civil despotism or console its victims? And are we to be seriously told, that the most infamous and profligate civil dynasty that ever swayed the sceptre of despotic authority, is preferable to a system of liberty which recognizes no power but that of the laws, except on these mere occasions, when the extreme necessities of war demand that those laws should be partially and temporarily suspended, as the only means of effecting the public safety? Does the gentleman not know, that, under every form of Government, and in every country, of which history has kept a record, this power has been exercised by the military defenders of the nation, and that, in the very nature of things, it must be exercised by every Government charged with the duty, the sacred duty, of maintaining the independence and preserving the existence of the body politic! And yet the gentleman—such is his estimate of civil liberty—would prefer the dominion of the hereditary monarch, exercising the power of unlimited taxation in peace and in war, without any limitation, either as to time or circumstances, and without consulting the Representatives of the People, to the freedom we enjoy under this Government, and under the military usages which have been habitually recognized and sanctioned by this whole People, and by all their public functionaries. Sir, if this be the opinion which that gentleman entertains of civil liberty, I do not envy him the exclusive enjoyment of it.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

Now, sir, I put it to the gentleman to state what inference he means to draw in reference to the merits of this claim, from his argument, or more properly, his declamation, on the subject of this military power. He says it is a power extremely dangerous. I grant that in the fullest extent. Yet, as the gentleman has been constrained to admit that it is a power that must be exercised in cases of extreme emergency, and has not pretended to deny the existence of such emergency in the case we are considering, how is the claim of the individual sufferer invalidated by the fact that the injury he sustained was inflicted in the exercise of a delicate and dangerous power? Suppose, sir, it be granted that the impressment was strictly illegal, (and I am not disposed to dispute about terms,) can it be seriously believed that the right of the individual to indemnification—a right expressly guaranteed by the Constitution—can be impaired by the admission? Is he to be gravely told by this Government, “true, sir, your property has been seized, and converted to the military use of the Republic, but as it was illegally taken, you must pocket the injury, and rest satisfied with the consoling reflection, that the Government had no legal right to take it?” I am astonished to hear such a solemn mockery of argument advanced, or in any degree countenanced on this floor. It has been urged, indeed, that the refusal to indemnify the sufferer is the true mode of securing the rights of slave-holders from similar invasions in future of their rights of property. It would be just as reasonable to say that the best mode of suppressing highway robbery would be to publish a declaration that robberies of a certain description would not be punished.

The impressment in question was made under circumstances which furnished the strongest possible justification of the officer. It was essential to defend from pillage and desolation a city which is the key to one-third part of this Union; and I should regard it as a disgrace to the Government, if it were to refuse its sanction to this, among other cases, of a similar nature, and to attempt to avoid paying the claim of the petitioner upon the miserable subterfuge of the technical illegality of the impressment.

Having exposed the drift and inconsistency of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, the object I had in view in rising is accomplished. I did not intend, when I rose, to utter a word on the merits of this claim, but to limit myself to the task of proving that the speech of the gentleman from New York was neither consistent with itself, nor with his general course in relation to similar claims. On the intrinsic merits of the claim, I think it would be difficult to speak pertinently to the question more than fifteen minutes. In conclusion, I will submit a word or two—contrary to my intention when I rose—upon the principle which ought, in my opinion, to govern the decision of the Committee.

Every gentleman who has participated in this debate—there may be possibly a single exception—has admitted unequivocally that negro slaves are property. Then, sir, I submit this question to the gentlemen opposed to this claim. If the other property impressed be the proper subject of indemnification, upon what principle can this species of property be excluded from the benefit of a similar indemnity? The injury is the same to the owner—the benefit is the same to the Government—and it is impossible to resist the claim, disguise it as we may, but upon the latent assumption that negro slaves are not property. I therefore hope that those gentlemen who have conceded to them the character of property, will exhibit a consistency between their words and their actions, by voting for the proposed amendment.

Mr. STORRES, said that the gentleman from South Carolina had misunderstood him, or he would have seen the ground on which he had drawn the distinction between the impressment of other property and the impressment of a slave. I said expressly, observed Mr. S., that, if I were an officer, and a pressing emergency presented itself, I would myself take private property for the public use, and trust to my Government for indemnity. I have always voted to indemnify officers for so doing where I thought that necessity justified the act, and where no great principle was violated. I stated, the other day, that if the officer had exercised his discretion in a fair and proper manner, we are bound to indemnify him; but to indemnify him as a trespasser—and because he could have no other indemnity than that which proceeded from our act. This is the principle which is contended against now. I think the exercise of such power is an evil; but if it is fairly exercised, I would never refuse to indemnify the officer. I voted to indemnify Gen. Swartwout, and, on another occasion, to indemnify Gen. Brown; but I said, in relation to slaves, I never would consent that an officer should exercise this discretion. It is too dangerous. The safety of a large portion of this Union is too deeply concerned; and though I would indemnify for the taking of other property, I would always make this an exception. This was the ground I took, and in this doctrine I can perceive nothing to justify a charge of inconsistency—if there is inconsistency in this, the gentleman from South Carolina has, indeed, shewn me to be so; but I cannot consider the suggestion as anything more than the very common parliamentary argument to refute a proposition that can be successfully met in no other way.

Mr. McDUFFIE rejoined.

Mr. DRAYTON now obtained the floor, and was proceeding as he said to shew the inconsistency and contradiction which had been manifested by the gentleman from New York, when he yielded the floor to

Mr. HAMILTON, who moved that, as the hour was now late, the Committee should rise.

JAN. 15, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. or R.]

The Committee rose accordingly, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; and the question being on granting leave, it passed in the negative—Ayes 69, Noes 77.

Mr. RANDOLPH now moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill and amendment, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims; but

Mr. McDUFFIE expressing a desire that the bill should now pass,

Mr. RANDOLPH divided his motion, and the question being put on discharging the Committee, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH then said, I now renew the motion to recommit the bill—and I will state my reasons for making it. I said, when I attempted to exculpate myself from the implied censure of the gentleman from New York, that I did not read the reports of the committees, but I did not mean, by this, that I did not look at the facts in the cases on which they report—my habit is to look at the evidence and to look at the bill, and then to trust to the discussion for the rest; because, sir, there is a physical impossibility that I should read all we print (for whose benefit I don't know, certainly not for ours, or the People's.) But it appears to me, sir, that there is in this report of the Committee of Claims—what shall I call it? I will not give it any character—but it is reasoning that I cannot subscribe to. The report would have us pay for the cart and horse, but not for the slave—but the owner lost the one as well as the other—and I used the maxim inter arma silent leges as stating the fact, not justifying it—he has lost his property—it is gone—it went flagrante bello, and the sole point is, shall he be paid for it? Whether taken lawfully or unlawfully, still it must be paid for—if it was taken lawfully it should be, as my colleague [Mr. P. P. BARRETT] has conclusively proved—as he proves every thing—then, a fortiori, it should be paid for if taken unlawfully. It is because I dissent from the doctrine in the report that I have now moved to re-commit the bill and report—and why re-commit? Because, if we refuse to do so, we do practically sustain the doctrine and adopt the reasoning of the Committee. I thought I heard, substantially, the same doctrine on a question in comparison to which even that between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from South Carolina is of little moment—I mean the question, who shall be the next ruler of this Commonwealth.

Mr. HAMILTON was opposed to the recommitment. He did not desire, after the discussion which had taken place, to have a decision defeated by any interlocutory matter or measure. He hoped it would not be disposed of until an opportunity was afforded of taking the question upon it.

[Mr. RANDOLPH here, speaking across, said, I will withdraw it, then. Mr. HAMILTON expressing some surprise at the interruption—Mr. R. said, he had not declared his willingness to withdraw the motion from the least unwillingness to listen to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina.]

Mr. HAMILTON resumed. I am persuaded it cannot be from impatience to hear, that the gentleman was so hasty in withdrawing: for, surely, if one good turn deserves another, that gentleman ought to be the last to refuse that attention to others which he always receives himself. I hope, Sir, when the whole argument is clear, when the battle has been fought and the field is just about to be decided, that the bill will not be recommitted. After I fight a battle, I wish either to beat or be beaten.

Mr. WHITTLESLEY now renewed the motion which Mr. RANDOLPH had withdrawn, to recommit the bill. He desired this, in order that the Committee of Claims, as well as the House, might be enabled to obtain a correct view of the facts. This they had not yet had, for want of the necessary testimony, and it was a rule in all the Committees of the House, where testimony was not sufficient fully to establish the claim, to make an unfavourable report; but, then, they do not turn away the claimant by a final rejection: they determine on the principle involved in his claim, and he may afterwards farther establish his facts, if he can. If there is a disposition in this House, said Mr. W., to pay for the loss or injury of this property, the case at least should be scrutinized by the same rule as other cases. If this is, indeed, a case of impressment the Committee should have evidence that such was the fact. The impressment is the leading fact in the case, and the impressment is not proved. It surely does not follow, because the slave is property, and because he was injured in the service of the United States, that, therefore, he must have been impressed into that service. It is necessary to know whether his master did not take or send him voluntarily into the public service; whether he was willing to take the risk or not; and on this point the Committee are without any satisfactory evidence.

Mr. GURLEY, of Lou. now desired to renew in the House the amendment he had offered in the Committee; but the motion was declared not in order until the recommitment was decided on.

Mr. McDUFFIE would add one word. Would the recommitment gratify the gentleman from the Committee of Claims? if not, he could see no good result from it—what are we to refer? The Committee have reported in favor of paying for the cart and horse, and the self-same principle is involved in paying for the slave.

Mr. WHITTLESLEY replied—The Committee have no evidence that the slave who was injured was in possession of the cart and horse. There were five slaves taken—but whether this slave, or some other of the five, was with the cart when it was taken, does not appear. The Committees of the House have never reported favorably where the evidence was imperfect—nor has the House ever sanctioned such a practice. Let the owner come here and fill the chasm in the testimony, and then the Committee can report with proper facts in their possession. Mr. W. disclaimed every thing like irritated feeling in relation to this case—and regretted that he could not have had an opportunity, at a proper period of the debate, of expressing more fully his views. He would not now detain the House to do so, and he concluded by expressing his hope that the House would not refuse to the Committee the testimony which they called for.

Mr. HAMILTON said, the gentleman from Ohio had been unfortunate, to say no more, in selecting this late hour to declare, for the first time, the defect in testimony to which he has now alluded. If the Committee doubted the competence of the evidence before them, he (Mr. H.) had certainly never heard of it before. How soon could the gentleman have cut short the debate which had so long agitated the House, if he had apprised them that they were all this while discussing a case which, after all, was purely hypothetical. But now—at the moment the final blow is about to struck, he makes an objection to the testimony of the facts. Sir, I am opposed to the recommitment. I do not wish to have a side-blow like this after a discussion of five days. If the gentleman has anything to say relating to the certificate on file, let him say it, and let us have a decision.

Mr. GURLEY now said, that, as the gentleman from Ohio had intimated that the testimony of the impressment was incomplete, he would, for his satisfaction on this point, send to the Clerk's table a number of affidavits going most fully to settle that point—and which he desired to have read.

The affidavits were about to be read, when an adjournment took place.

Mobile Court Martial.

MILITIA COURTS MARTIAL.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution, moved by Mr. SLOANE, of Ohio, on the 11th instant :

And the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. WICKLIFFE, on the 14th instant, to strike out from the resolution all that part of it after the word "decisions," and to insert the following, to wit :

"And also to furnish copies of all papers, letters, and documents, relating to said Court Martial; copies of all orders, general or special, made or issued by the President of the United States, or by the Secretary of War, concerning or relating to the length of service of the detachment of the Tennessee Militia, detailed under the order of the Governor of said State, issued on the twentieth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and afterwards placed under the immediate command of Lieutenant Colonel Philip Pipkin; also, copies of the muster and pay rolls of said militiamen, which may be on file in the Department of War."

Mr. SLOANE said, that he thought it proper to remark, that, as there was no difference between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] (who had yesterday moved an amendment to the resolution) and himself, as to the object in view, he was prepared to adopt the amendment, and he had therefore modified his resolution so as to read as follows :

"And to furnish copies of any orders of the President or Secretary of War, by which, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the President by the 8th section of the act of the 18th April, 1814, the term of service of the Tennessee Militia may have been extended beyond three months; and if no such order exist on file in the War Department, to state that fact to this House; and, also, to furnish copies of any correspondence in the War Department between the President or Secretary of War, and the Governor of Tennessee, during the late war, on the subject of the time which the drafted militia of said State should be required to serve in the armies of the United States."

After some explanation between the SPEAKER, Mr. SLOANE, and Mr. WICKLIFFE, as to the effect of the modification—

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he had an amendment to offer to the resolution, which would afford the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] time to examine and understand it, in its present form, as it had been modified by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SLOANE.] He was pleased that such a resolution had been moved, because the subject had already excited much public interest; indeed, it had attracted the attention of the whole nation. He wished to have presented before the American People the documents, and all the documents, which related to this transaction.

It would seem, from the terms of the resolution, in its original form, that its intention was rather to implicate the then Governor of Tennessee than the distinguished individual who was now so conspicuously within the public view. Even in its present modified state, it does not embrace all the documents which it is proper we should obtain. The People of this country feel a deep interest in every thing which relates to the character and conduct of that individual. It was necessary, therefore, that the whole case should be brought before this House, and the public. [He then moved an amendment, which called for a copy of the order issued by Governor Blount to General Jackson.]

Mr. B. said, he would state his reason for this motion. He had observed in the public papers, some time ago, a copy of the order issued by Governor Blount to General Jackson, in May, 1814. If this copy were authentic—and he had no reason to doubt its authenticity—it would cast a blaze of light upon the subject. If any person could, by possibility, be implicated, it would be Gov. Blount, and not General Jackson.

In that order, the Governor explicitly declares, that it was issued in compliance with the requisition of Major General Pinckney. It commanded General Jackson to order out one thousand men, of the second division of Tennessee militia, for the term of six months, unless they should be sooner discharged by the President of the United States. And it declared, that this latitude, in relation to the call, had been given by instructions from the War Department. It will be recollected, that General Jackson was, at that time, an officer in the militia, and not of the regular army. He was bound to obey this order of the Governor of his own State; and it could never have occurred to him to inquire whether that officer had lawful authority to issue it, especially when upon its face, it contained an express recital of such authority. If this order did issue, it will shew conclusively that, if there be any question in the case, it has an immediate bearing upon Gov. Blount, and not upon General Jackson. Mr. B. wished to have a copy of this order. No doubt the Governor had transmitted it to the War Department, under whose authority he had been acting. Mr. B. concluded by expressing a hope that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SLOANE] would accept his amendment as a modification of the resolution.

Mr. SLOANE now signified his acceptance of the modification proposed by Mr. BUCHANAN, and the resolution having been read, as modified—

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend it, by striking out the following :

"And to furnish copies of any orders of the President or Secretary of War, by which, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the President, by the eighth section of the act of 18th April, 1814, the term of service of the Tennessee Militia may have been extended beyond three months; and, if no such order exists on file in the War Department, to state that fact to this House: And also, to furnish copies of any correspondence in the War Department between the President or Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, during the late War, on the subject of the time which the drafted militia of said State should be required to serve in the armies of the United States."

In support of this amendment,

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, he had risen to propose an amendment to the gentleman's resolution as now modified. It is to strike out all that part of the resolution which calls upon the Secretary of War for copies of any orders made by the President, under the discretion given by the act of 1814, by which the length of service of the Tennessee militia was extended, and also copies of the correspondence between Governor Blount and the Department of War, upon the length of time which the militia of Tennessee were bound to serve.

I will, said Mr. W. briefly state my reason for this motion. I have no disposition to discuss the merits or point to the objects to be effected by this resolution. I would rather leave that task to the People; they will not fail correctly to appreciate the great public utility to be promoted by the important disclosures which are to follow the gentleman's call for information.

The mover of this resolution avowed his object to be a desire to obtain all the information in the Department of War, connected with the Court Martial and the six militiamen. His resolution, if modified as proposed by me, will give him all the documents which belong to that subject. He desires a copy of "any order or regulation made by the President, under the act of 1814," by which the term of service of the Tennessee militia was extended to six months. I am satisfied, and so must be the gentleman, that no such order ever was made, either as relates to the militia of Tennessee or any other State, save to the requisitions which may have been made from time to time upon the Executive of the respective States, by the letters of the Secretary of War, calling upon them to detail their quota of men. Why then call for a copy of a paper which we believe, and which the public have been assured, does not and never did exist? If such an order were on file, would we have the call for it? I will not answer the question. If it is not there, I am to be told the Secretary is called upon "to state the facts." We ask for a thing which we know we cannot get; and if we could get it we would not ask it.

The object avowed, or seemed to be avowed by the gentleman from Ohio, is to ascertain the main fact, how long these men, I mean the six militia men, were bound to serve. To obtain this object, can it be necessary to call upon the Secretary to inform us that President Madison and the Secretary of War failed to discharge their duty in omitting to enter upon the records of the Office of War, that the militia called into service from the State of Tennessee, should serve six months, three months, or any other term of time? I repeat, the important fact in this investigation is to know whether the detachment of militia, of which the six shot for mutiny and desertion were a part, were called into service for six months. An answer to this question, full and complete, must be given in responding to the resolution as proposed to be modified. If the gentleman's object was a reformation of the militia law of the last war, which has performed its functions; if he designed to arraign the then President of the United States, and his Secretary of War, for a dereliction of duty, perhaps the information sought might be proper as a preliminary step. No such purpose is intended or expected. I do not understand this resolution to be a declaration of war against the distinguished citizen who then filled the Presidential chair.

Unless gentlemen will close their eyes, it is impossible not to see its tendency. It is in vain to disguise it. Why has this business slept so long? Why has it not excited the patriotic sensibilities of the statesmen who have filled this hall for the last fifteen years? Is there a member on this floor who does not believe the effect of this resolution is most anxiously looked to, as appalling to the hopes of the gentleman whose fame has been assailed by every art which intrigue and falsehood could invent? I will not say that such is the desire of the gentleman from Ohio, or those here who act with him.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. W., to strip this subject of all extraneous matter. I wish to present it naked to the public eye. The man whose character has been assailed on account of the execution of the six militiamen, seeks no concealment. His conduct on this, as on all other occasions when he has been engaged in the service of his country, will stand the test of human scrutiny and of time.

I object to that part of the resolution which calls for the correspondence between Governor Blount and the Secretary of War, for the same reasons. That correspondence has nothing to do with the six militiamen. It relates exclusively to other detachments of militia, called into service under the authority of the State. When the Creek Indians commenced hostilities, and threatened devastation to the frontiers of the Southwest, the Legislature of that truly gallant and patriotic State, with a promptitude which did honor to its members, called out the militia, without regard as to the duration of service, and placed them under the command of a General who was destined to conquer. Some of the troops were detailed for three months, some for six months, others for no definite period. These troops were afterward ordered into the service of the United States. In the midst of difficulties which no other man but Jackson would have surmounted—in the heart of an enemy's country—with a starving and suffering soldiery, unable to advance, and unwilling to retreat, the time for which the greater portion of his men had agreed to serve was about to expire, or had expired: then it was that the correspondence which gentlemen so much desire, commenced: then it was that it became a matter of enquiry with the Commanding General, the Government, and the Secretary of War, what length of time these Tennessee militia were bound to serve. What has this to do with the six militiamen who were detailed and mustered into the service of the United States on the 20th June, 1814, for a six months' tour.

This correspondence has been seized, (by those whose employments for the last twelve months has been to mislead the public mind,) and connected with the militia who mutinied at Fort Strother, in September, 1814. This correspondence has furnished alimant for the malice which has been employed in the abuse of that man whose reputation is the property of his country. We have heard it said, and seen it published, that these militiamen had served out their time, and that Jackson had illegally and wantonly shed the innocent blood of his fellow men.

Yes, sir, after this misrepresentation had gone the rounds, during the late Summer's campaign, with cold reluctance, after persevering application, we were informed, officially, that they were mustered into the service for six months.

I am opposed to the call for this correspondence, not because I dread its disclosure; no, sir, it has nothing to do with the question. It will only mislead the public mind. If it is given connected with that of Gen. Jackson upon the same subject, it will shed a lustre upon the talents and patriotism of him whose destruction seems to be essential to the future hopes of others. We will see, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, the true Roman, one "who possesses more of the devoted feeling which in the love of country forgets self, than any man now living."

Mr. BELL said, it would, perhaps, not be in order to enter into any general discussion of the merits of the resolution, nor of the objects intended to be attained by it, further than might be necessary to express his views, briefly, of the propriety of adopting the amendment moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, so far as it proposed to strike out those words, which, if adopted as part of the resolution, would give the Secretary of War any latitude of remark, upon what may not be found upon record in his Department. I certainly would not think of intruding myself for one moment upon the indulgence of the House, said Mr. B. seeing so many abler men around me ready to take up the subject, if I did not perceive that the purpose of the resolution may be to arraign, before the tribunal of the public, the character of a distinguished citizen, who resides in my own immediate neighborhood. Under this impression, I feel myself called upon by a sense of duty, to notice an attack made on him, which I conceive to be unmerited and unjust, for the same reason that I would feel it my duty to defend the reputation of every other private citizen of the district I have the honor to represent, and who could not be heard in his own defence on this floor. I acknowledge, however, that I may possibly do injustice to the intentions of the mover of the resolution, in supposing that the conduct of the distinguished individual I have alluded to, is alone to be the subject of investigation. Judging from what appears upon the face of the resolution, and the imperfect avowal of the mover, as to what may be his motive, it is left doubtful whether one or all of several gentlemen of distinction, are intended to be the object of attack. It may be intended to disturb the repose of a late President of the United States: for, if it shall turn out to be true, that Mr. Madison did permit a Secretary of War to invest the Governor of a State, during the late war, with important discretionary powers, without his authority, and suffered a large detachment of militia to be called into service for the purpose of manning several important posts, situated at a great distance from the States from whence they were drawn, without giving any instruction for retaining them in service for six months, when it is evident that the shorter term of three months must have been chiefly consumed in distributing them among the posts to which they were ordered, then was he guilty of a most gross and criminal omission of duty. If a late Secretary of War proceeded to exercise such extensive powers without the sanction of the President, or failed to renew his instructions to the Governor of Tennessee, according to the requisitions of the law, and the exigencies of the war, then was he guilty of a usurpation of authority, or a neglect of an important duty. I confess I am not ready to admit that a late Governor of Tennessee could be charged with any gross impropriety of conduct, in proceeding to act under discretionary powers, conferred without any other limit as to the time in which they were to be considered operative, than the termination of the war, even if the fact be that his instructions were not renewed in the Spring of 1814. But how a charge of improper conduct, or responsibility for the blunders and omissions of others, if any such there were, can be fixed upon the mere instrument and organ appointed for the execution of the orders and decrees of his superiors in office; how such a charge can be fixed upon the distinguished individual to whom I have more than once alluded, for retaining in service the detachment of militia referred to in the resolution, during a term of six months, and treating them accordingly, when it is known that he ordered out that detachment, acting then as Major General of militia, and that, in doing so, he obeyed, as he was bound to do, an order from the Governor of the State of Tennessee, expressly stating, upon the face of it, that the detachment was to serve six months, and that the Secretary of War had authorized that latitude of the call, is to me most incomprehensible. But if it be against him that this resolution is intended to operate, then I would remind gentlemen that they begin their attacks at the wrong end, and that there is but little magnanimity in striking at the tail, instead of the head, of the offending series of public agents.

Be this, however, as it may, and we shall know more, and hear more, too, perhaps, upon this subject, when the Secretary shall have made his report, yet, I feel bound, in courtesy, to believe that the mover of the resolution, no matter against whom the attack may be meditated, would not have proceeded to lay the foundation of an enquiry of such a nature in this House, unless he expected some public benefit to result from it. No other motive could, in my opinion, justify such a step. It would, therefore, be illiberal to suppose him capable of a design to avail himself of any improper or unfair means to advance his purpose; it being in extreme cases only, that the public good may be consulted by the sacrifice of justice and candor. But I put it to the gentleman himself to say whether this liberal presumption can continue to operate in his favor, if, while he seeks to give weight to an accusation, by the notice this house may take of it, he still persists in the attempt to bring it forward, bolstered up by the opinions and arguments of an officer of this Government, high in authority and patronage. This House should act on this subject, as upon all others, free from every bias. The prejudices of our minds should be discarded, if possible, and certainly we should not be exposed to the influence of the prejudices of others. Could a more dangerous precedent be established, in cases of this nature, than to allow the opinions of the high officers attached to the Executive Department of the Government, to cast their weight into the balance against the reputation of a private citizen, who, for some cause or other, has become obnoxious to them? I would not be understood as speaking harshly of the Secretary of War, in anticipation of what his opinions may be. I do not pretend to know what his opinions or prejudices may be upon this subject, nor is it material to the argument whether they are one way or the other; my purpose, in addressing the House, being not to oppose the utmost latitude which can be given to a call for facts, from which we have nothing to fear, but to ask that every pretext shall be taken away from the honorable Secretary, for attempting to assist our judgments, by the exercise of his own. I am glad that the gentleman from Ohio, in agreeing to modify the resolution in one point, has acknowledged that there are gentlemen on this floor, (of course I would not be included in the number,) who are competent to decide what laws were in force fourteen years ago, and under what laws certain important arrangements were made for the public defence, without an appeal to the learning of the Secretary of War.

I have no disposition to delay the decision of this question, by any farther discussion of it on my part. I would, however, respectfully suggest to the mover of the resolution, that if he still thinks any great public interest can be secured, by attempting to bring down reproach upon the character of the distinguished citizen so often alluded to, his patriotic intentions will be best promoted, by avoiding all suspicion of unfair dealing in the process which shall be adopted for that purpose: for I scarcely need remind that gentleman, that, by a very large proportion of his fellow citizens of the United States, he is thought to have deserved well of his country: nay, I am convinced they would believe with reluctance that he was unworthy of public confidence, and, if I am not greatly deceived, the nation at large could not see but with deep concern, one of the chief pillars of its fame broken down, and cast into the mass of neglected rubbish.

In what I have said at this time, I have endeavored to avoid all criminary reflections, being sensible, as I am, of the serious, the deep responsibility which will be incurred to this House and to this country, by him who shall persist in provoking a kind of discussion, tending to convert this House into an arena for the exhibition of fetes of violent party degradation in debate, to the exclusion of more appropriate business, and endangering its credit with the People, upon whose good opinion alone it must depend for the support of its measures.

Mr. CULPEPER said, that he did not know the motives of other gentlemen, and he thought that the House had nothing to do with the motives of any of its members. Their conduct alone was the proper subject of animadversion. What I want, said Mr. C., in this case, is the truth, and nothing but the truth, and I intend to move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table, that gentlemen on both sides may consult together and agree upon the proper form of this call, without further dispute on this floor. I want, I repeat it, nothing but the truth. I have no wish to get rid of the subject, but a very strong wish to get clear of this very disagreeable debate.

Mr. C. then moved to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. POLK, who said: Since the gentleman from Ohio had been pleased, at this particular juncture of time, to introduce to the consideration of the House, this extraordinary resolution, none could doubt its object. He did not rise to oppose it, however unnecessary he might have considered its introduction to be. He fully concurred with the gentleman from North Carolina, that, if we called for information at all, we should embrace in the resolution a call for all the facts in reference to the "six militia men," in the possession of the Secretary of War, and he wished nothing but the facts. He wished to embrace in the call, copies of all the correspondence, documents, and orders, which may be on file in the Department of War, but he did not wish to pass the resolution in such a shape, as, by implication or construction, to enable the Secretary of War to accompany the facts with an argument, or exculpatory defence of himself in reference to what had heretofore taken place on this subject. When the House receive the documents themselves, gentlemen here, and the public, would be able to form their own opinion upon them, without the aid of any lights from the Secretary of War, or any other officer of the Government, in the shape of argument. It was with a view to obtain the facts and the facts only, that he supported the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The ostensible object of the resolution seemed to be, to obtain information from the Department of War in relation to the detachment of militia, of which the "six militia men," executed at Mobile, under sentence of a Court-martial, for the crime of mutiny and desertion, in 1814, were a part; and yet the gentleman from Ohio proposes, by the resolution, to call for the whole correspondence between the Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, not only in relation to this particular detachment of militia, but from the commencement of the war, in 1812, until its termination. The gentleman was not content to have the correspondence in relation to this particular detachment, which was already embraced in another part of his resolution, but desired all the correspondence which ever took place between the Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, during the whole war, in relation to other detachments called into the public service from Tennessee, at different periods. He could not perceive the purpose to be effected by calling for a lengthy correspondence, which had no connexion with the main object of the inquiry, unless it was to obscure and cover up the material facts of the case, by a mass of documents which had no relation to it. Why had not the gentleman likewise called for all the correspondence with the Governors of other States, whose militia were in the public service during the war? It would have just as much to do with the "six militia men," as that part of the correspondence with the Governor of Tennessee which does not relate to the service of the "six militiamen," or the detachment to which they belonged. He wished the information called for, when received, to stand naked before the public, and to be stripped of all extraneous matter.

One word in relation to this resolution, generally, and to its object as avowed by the mover. In ordinary cases, when information is asked from the President or Heads of Departments, it is presumed to be necessary, in order to predicate upon it some legislative act, or to enlighten the understanding of the House, in reference to some subject pending before it. The gentleman from Ohio had avowed in his place, the other day, that he did not know that the information called for was necessary for either of these purposes, or that it would be so used. For what purpose, then, did the gentleman want it? He had informed us. This subject, (the trial and execution of the "six militiamen,") said he, has produced considerable excitement in the public mind during the last year, and he wished to see how the matter was. Sir, said Mr. P., after this avowal on the part of the mover of the resolution, the object of this resolution was too obvious to be concealed or disguised. The public will understand, and duly appreciate it.

[The SPEAKER here remarked, that the hour allotted to the morning's business had expired, and that the further discussion of the resolution must be suspended.]

Mr. POLK moved to postpone the Orders of the Day, that the discussion might proceed; remarking, that, as the discussion had commenced, it would be an economy of time to dispose of the resolution at once.

The motion to postpone prevailed—yeas 98, nays 71.

Mr. POLK resumed. It was no part of his purpose at present to defend the distinguished citizen of his own State, who commanded in the South during the late war, and whom it was now attempted to assail. For, disguise it as you will, such was unquestionably the purpose of this resolution; but he would say, in relation to this celebrated matter of the "six militiamen," tried and executed for the crime of mutiny and desertion, at Mobile, in 1814, that that individual and his friends have nothing to fear. As one of his friends, he wished the public to have the facts, the whole facts, and nothing but the facts connected with that transaction, and should therefore vote for the resolution, however unnecessary it may have been to have introduced it. The friends of that individual do not shrink from making the call, since the gentleman from Ohio desired it. They do not fear to meet the facts, and with every confidence successfully, before an impartial public. After the lapse of more than thirteen years from the date of that transaction, it was now for the first time introduced here. When other charges were alleged against General Jackson, immediately after the war—when the Seminole question was discussed and decided in this House—this affair of the "six militiamen" slept and slumbered; it was not then heard of; it did not then constitute any charge against him. The American People, at that time, when the occurrences of the war in the South were fresh in the recollections, spoke a language that was intelligible; they awarded to that distinguished man, what his eminent services merited—their approbation of his conduct. But now, for the first time, the new charge in relation to the "six militiamen" was thrust upon the consideration of this body. Why introduce it at this particular juncture? Why had it not heretofore claimed the attention of the gentleman from Ohio? He would detain the House no longer. The American People will understand and duly appreciate the object.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he hoped to be more successful in avoiding topics not necessarily involved in the question before the House, than some gentlemen had been who had made the same promise. The proposition is to strike out a part of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SLOANE.] Much had been said of that gentleman's motives. Whatever they may be, they are no concern of ours. It belongs not to us to scrutinize into the motives of any member here; they are confined to his own breast, which no human eye can penetrate. They can be known only to the Searcher of hearts.

Mr. S. said he would not himself have introduced the original resolution; and, it was, perhaps, unnecessary for him to say, that he had no knowledge that such a motion was contemplated until he heard it read at the Clerk's table. But the resolution is before us. Its passage is not opposed. The single question upon the present motion, is, whether the call shall be more or less extended; whether we shall have more or less information—a part or the whole? The gentlemen who support this motion, have assumed two things—first, that there can be but one single object in asking this information; and, secondly, that the information, if obtained, would have no connexion with that object. It has been urged that the only purpose of this resolution was to affect a single individual. If that be the only purpose of the mover, whether the individual be high or low, it meets not my approbation. But the resolution being here, and it being agreed on all hands that it is to be adopted, may not other gentlemen wish that other objects may be obtained by it?

It was conceded by the gentleman from Kentucky,

H. of R.]

Mobile Court Martial.

[Mr. WICKLIFFE] that, if a revision of our militia laws was proposed, the parts which he has moved to strike out, ought to be retained. Now, sir, it so happens that we have, this morning, had laid upon our desks a bill from the Senate revising those laws. Upon that bill we may be called upon to act during the present session. Surely, then, according to the gentleman's own views, it will be proper to obtain this information, in order that we may be guided by the light of past experience, in adopting the provisions or proposing amendments to that bill.

What is it proposed to strike out? Copies of orders from the Secretary of War, relative to the length of time which the Tennessee militia should be required to serve, and copies of correspondence between the Executive of the United States and the Chief Magistrate of Tennessee upon the same subject. And it is insisted that these can have no bearing upon the present subject. Do they not appear, on the face of the proposition, to have a palpable and an intimate connexion with it? And can we say, before-hand, that they can have no relation to it whatever? When seeking light, shall we voluntarily close the avenues through which it is expected to be received?

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] urged, as an objection to that part of the resolution which calls for the correspondence, that, if complied with, and copies be sent here, it will tend to obscure the subject. But the gentleman then proceeded himself to relate to us, from memory, the contents of that correspondence. Could he intend to obfuscate (to adopt an unusual but expressive word) the understanding of the House? He certainly could have had no apprehension of such an effect. And if we may with safety turn our attention to the contents of that correspondence, when stated verbally, and from memory merely, there cannot be danger in receiving official copies of it, from the documents in the Departments.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] has advocated this amendment with much vehemence, because he would not have any arguments or opinions from the Secretary of War. The time was, I believe, when that gentleman entertained different views of the proper scope of calls of this kind. A certain resolution, of some notoriety, proposed to call upon the Head of a Department, not only for facts, but for reasons also; and to that resolution it was understood, the gentleman from Tennessee had no aversion. But the truth is, that this resolution calls for no opinion, and no argument whatever. The gentleman must have labored under a great misapprehension. It requires copies, and copies only, of official orders and official letters; and, if none are found in the Department, that the Secretary shall merely state that fact. The gentleman wants no statement from the Secretary of War! Sir, every call for copies from a Department, necessarily requires such statement, in the contingency of the records not being found. Such is the invariable practice. If you demand of an officer documents which are not in his possession, he must return to you a respectful answer, stating that fact.

The gentleman from Tennessee declares that he is anxious to obtain all the documents and all the facts. The resolution, as it stands, proposes to produce to him the very objects of his wishes, official copies of official documents; and certainly, if he reconsiders the subject, he will not insist on rejecting them.

Mr. S. concluded by saying, that he felt very little interest in the original resolution, but, if it were to pass, he hoped it would retain its present form, and not be curtailed by the proposed amendment. If the House did call for any information upon this subject, he hoped they would require the whole.

Mr. BELL now said, that, in the remarks he had before offered, he had no intention of expressing any wish of striking out the last clause of the resolution, as modified. He should prefer to include every thing which could be called a statement of facts, and he hoped the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] would consent to modify his amendment so as to retain the following words:

"And also to furnish copies of any correspondence, in the War Department, between the President, or Secretary of War, and the Governor of Tennessee, during the late war, on the subject of the time which the drafted Militia of said State should be required to serve in the armies of the United States."

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that no possible modification could, in anywise, affect the course he had chalked out to himself, and for reasons which he would now briefly state. I will promise, said Mr. R. if I throw no light upon the subject, that, at least, I will not (to borrow a word used by the honorable gentleman from Maine) "obfuscate" it.

I concur most heartily with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. COOPER] in his view of this matter. Before he made his motion, I had expressed a similar opinion to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON.] I am sorry he withdrew it. I think the House ought not to act in this matter at all. And why? Because, sir, disguise it as much as we will—as much as we can—it is a matter (as was said in another body, on a very different occasion) as notorious as the sun at noon day, that the state of public feeling throughout this country (and what are we but the pulse, the artery, which shows the action, the sanity, or the unsoundness of the heart?) is such, that, if this game is once commenced, there will be no end to it. Sir, I have nothing to do with gentlemen's motives. I am bound, not only by the Rules and Orders of this House, and by a sense of decorum, which ought to be a still stronger restraint on every gentleman, but I am bound by evidence before my senses—to believe, that the motives of the gentleman from Ohio cannot be such as have been imputed to him. And why? It is notorious, that you affect a balance as much, by taking out of one scale, as by putting into the other; and after what I have seen in the public prints, under his name, he can never surely mean, by taking out of the scale A, to give preponderance to the scale B. I wonder, sir, that it did not appear to the very acute and astute perception of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SPAID] that there was another occasion for this information, besides the bill from the Senate on the subject of the militia laws. This House, in the last resort, may, by the Constitution, be called upon to decide that question on which the public mind is in a state of so great and so justifiable inflammation. Now, as we may be called upon the next session, to decide that question, and good managers, all people of forecast, like to be beforehand with their business, it is no doubt highly proper that we should proceed now to get all the information we may need in the performance of that duty. But, sir, it is time to dismiss this style of treating the subject—it demands a graver tone. A bill from the Senate, affecting the militia laws of the United States—well sir—a bill shall I call it, or an anathema got up by some of those, under whose order certain militiamen were shot at Norfolk is thrown in contemporaneously—not with the bill from the Senate—no sir—that is a different affair, but with this motion; an anathema, sir, has been issued from the laboratory of the modern Vatican, and comes to us via Richmond—yes, sir, via Richmond—and a nuncio has been despatched—(I believe I must drop the metaphor, or it will drop me)—well, sir, an agent, then, has been despatched, and has touched at this port, on his way to Richmond, for instructions—yes, sir, in mercantile phrase, cleared out for Cowes and a market—to Cowes, and wait for instructions from London. Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina deserves our thanks for having torn the mask off this thing yesterday. It is the curse of this age—the opprobrium of this country, in its legislation, that, in grave concerns, requiring the deliberation of statesmen, and the decision of common sense, a system is pursued of artificial reasoning, and of special pleading, drawn from the forensic school, (where it may be very right and proper,) and, while we are debating about the danger of having our heads chopped off by the myrmidons of an usurper, we are ourselves chopping logic. [By the way, sir, I was extremely sorry that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STORAS,] who spoke to us, the other day, about Cicero, did not favor the House, at the same time, with a dissertation on the subject of the Roman coaches, out of one of which, he told us, with great good breeding, that Cicero stretched his neck, that it might be struck off. Sir, I should greatly like to see a model of one of those coaches—I would send it to Longacre, by way of specimen—yes, sir, not as a model, but as a curiosity.] Great public mischief is produced by bringing into this House the system of word catching, and watching, and quibbling, and quirking, from the Court below—it will hardly do even there. Sir, this practice is as notorious as another, confessed to prevail in the House of Commons, on a subject of the most vital interest to the liberties of Englishmen—it is as “notorious as the Sun at noon-day.” We, sir, are country gentlemen, plain planters, or farmers, sometimes styled clod-hoppers—we have not a fair chance under such a system; and, what is worse, our constituents have not. Sir, it is time we had done with this practice, of looking one way and rowing another. I entirely concur with the view presented to us in the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CULPEPER]—I hope I may say, without offence, the Reverend gentleman from North Carolina. Sir, I applaud him for preaching peace—not peace, sir, with the enemy, in time of war—“Blessed are the peace-makers!”—but I am not one of those who preach the love of enemies in time of war. Let me ask of this House, if they can imagine a case in which, by bringing forward a motion in this House, every part and any part of the public conduct, (for we shall hardly invade the sanctuary of domestic life,) but the public conduct of either or any one of the parties now most prominent before the nation, may not be attacked? Sir, cannot we, too, bring motion after motion, to bear on one of them? We can: and I will tell the gentleman from Maine how—he does not need to be told—but I speak for the information of those out of this House—a resolution can be introduced, bringing a charge against the Minister—another motion can be brought against the conduct of some of our diplomatic agents—and then we shall discuss it here pro and con—such-a-one versus such-a-one—and then we must have another “blow-out”—and then again the same thing may be done on the appropriation of money. Sir, it is endless; and, therefore, I think we ought to remember the old doctrine—a doctrine I have long preached in this House, and which I ever shall preach, obsta principia. Occasion enough can be given for every man to shew, on the floor of this House, how much he is or is not a partisan. And where will it end? With the exception of, perhaps, the necessary appropriation bills, scarce any thing else will be done this session. For, do gentlemen believe, if this thing is done on one side, it will not be done on the other? Do old and practiced statesmen suppose that, if they trump, their adversaries will not trump too? Why, sir, I thought that Hoyle had taught them better. Yes, sir, that Hoyle had taught them better. Sir, we shall have our tables flooded with such resolutions. No, Sir, let us do what all men cannot at all times do, and some at no time—let us do right sir, fearless of the consequences. I know very well, what a bug-bear—what a ghost will be conjured up, if the motion to lay on the table shall prevail. Yes, Sir, it will be said, we are about to “put out the light, and then”— and then, sir, to smother the Constitution; to cut the throat—not of Cicero Sir, no Sir,—but of poor half-suffocated Desdemona—of the Constitution. Sir, this is a responsibility I am willing to meet; if I was not, I would not show my face here. When inquired of, I should say to my constituents, “a motion was made in this House, calling for information about the six militiamen—the public papers and the Richmond manifesto are full of the subject. It has been worn thread-bare. We were called upon to second the Anti-Jackson meeting at Richmond. It must have led to recrimination. We should have had the same game played over and over again, iterum iterumque. It would only have led to ill blood and calling names, and therefore, I endeavored to put an end to it at its commencement.” Sir, if the militia laws want mending, they will not get it, take my word for it, this session. Our militia-laws, Sir, are like some reprobates—always about to reform, or to be reformed. We do not want this information to act on the bill from the Senate, and as for the other object, most of us, I believe, are pretty well prepared to act on what we have.

I promised, when I rose, that, if I shed no light upon the subject, I would at least endeavor not to make it more obscure. I cannot promise e fumo dare lucem, but I will not lend my aid to raise a smoke to obscure the judgment and to inflame the mind’s eye of this House. Without wishing in the least to forestall debate, or put it out of the power of any gentleman to reply to me, I shall, before I take my seat, renew the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CULPEPER.] I shall move that the resolution and the amendment be laid, to lie upon the table. But I shall withdraw the motion if any friend, or if any adversary—for I trust I have no enemy here—shall request it. It is a case in which I would yield more readily to the request of an adversary than of a friend.

Mr. RANDOLPH so moved accordingly: when

Mr. WEEMS said, I request the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH retaining his seat,

Mr. WEEMS said, I call upon the gentleman to comply with the promise he has just given.

Mr. RANDOLPH still keeping his seat,

Mr. WEEMS said, I call upon the gentleman to fulfil his promise.

Mr. RANDOLPH now rose and said, Mr. Speaker, I rise to comply with it. I promised that if any friend, or, much more, any adversary, should make the request, I would withdraw my motion. I have never, thank God, refused to keep my word, nor shall I now break my promise. But, as that honorable gentleman stands to me in the relation, neither of a friend nor of an adversary, I shall not withdraw my motion.

The question being now about to be taken on Mr. RANDOLPH’S motion,

Mr. SLOANE requested that it be taken by yeas and nays. It was so ordered by the House, and the yeas and nays were taken as follows:—yeas 42, nays 150.

So the motion to lay the resolution and amendments on the table was negatived.

Mr. WEEMS said he felt very much gratified to find, by the vote just taken, that so large a majority of the House thought with him, that a subject of such importance ought not to be smothered or nipped in the bud (if he might be allowed to use the expression) at the instant suggestion of any member, and more especially so, when the vote seemed also to justify what he was about to offer as advice to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who had thought proper to quote the same authority as it regards peace makers: “Blessed are the peace makers,” &c. was his remark. “Let that man who esteemeth that he knoweth all things, remember that he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.” I have no idea, sir, [said Mr. W.] of any one individual member of this House undertaking to suppose, when he has made a speech, that every one is to be hushed by his shutting the door upon them, because, forsooth, he may suppose that they cannot or dare not introduce a word in reply to him. I had hoped, sir, after the member from Virginia had voluntarily promised to withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table, if any gentleman suggested a desire to be heard on the subject, upon rising and requesting him to suspend, or withdraw his motion, to have found him willing, at once, to comply; finding this not to be his disposition, I expressed a hope that the gentleman would comply with his word; and whether that gentleman considers me as standing in the relation of friend or enemy, or neither, towards him, sir, was neither asked or cared about. [Here the gentleman from Virginia asked permission of the gentleman from Maryland to apologize.] Mr. WEEMS, said he asked no apology, but would give the gentleman from Virginia an opportunity to explain; when

Mr. RANDOLPH said, nothing was further from his intentions, than to say any thing uncourteous. The gentleman from Maryland, [said Mr. R.] had called on him in so imperative a tone, that that happened which often happens in similar cases. We often refuse, what we should otherwise grant with willingness, when we conceive ourselves to be rather more enforced than we like to be. But, the candor of that gentleman will induce him to acknowledge that I stated neither more or less than what is the actual fact, when I said, that he stands to me in neither of the relations—either of adversary or friend. I can assure him, however, that I shall never again offend the gentleman by noticing him in that, or in any other way.

Mr. WEEMS said he was not disposed to trifle with the time of the House, or to attempt, in the slightest degree, to discuss the merits or demerits of the subject to which the proposition before the House, barely calling for information, pointed. But he rose to offer, first, his thanks to the gentleman from Ohio, for introducing the resolution, in any shape that would eventually obtain all the information immediately relating to the subject. He cared not about the form, or phraseology, provided it resulted in laying before the Nation the truth, and nothing but the truth. He agreed, to the fullest extent, with the gentleman from Maine, "that it was not our privilege to judge men's motives;" and he hoped he might be allowed to offer another quotation, as it seemed fashionable to do so, from the volume of truth, without incurring the appellation (sarcastically, or otherwise) of reverend gentleman from Maryland, "Who art thou, oh man, that judgest another man's servant? before his own master, he standeth or falleth." Sir, said Mr. W., this subject has now been introduced, and I, for one, am unwilling to return home to the high minded freemen whom I have the honor to represent, and say to them, I voted against this inquiry, because I feared to trust my strong prejudices and partialities. That might answer for the gentleman from Virginia, but it would not answer for me. Mr. W. protested against being governed by any such influence. The sovereign People of Maryland felt anxious for information, and would not be content without it, and, for himself, he could with truth declare that he wished it, and would receive it any how, rather than not have it, although he would prefer having it without any thing like that massive weight that accompanied some of our documents: for instance, the Georgia affair—the immense bulk of which deterred almost every man from attempting to wade through it. No, sir, said Mr. W., that man whose character and conduct are to be affected by it, will, like pure gold, seven times refined, be found the more pure the oftener his conduct or patriotism shall be scrutinized. I shall not trouble the House further, at this time, said Mr. W., from a hope, sir, that the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Kentucky will be able so to modify the proposition as not only to agree themselves, but to produce an accordance throughout the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he had but a few words to say, and would trouble the House but a short time. If I understand the question, Mr. Speaker, [said Mr. W.] that part of the resolution proposed to be stricken out by the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] embraces a call for copies of the correspondences of the Government of the Union, with the Governor of Tennessee, relative to the time the drafted Militia of that State should be continued in the service of the United States—for copies of any orders of the President, directing such drafted militia to be retained under the law of the United States, for a period beyond three months; and if no such order existed, directing the Secretary of War to certify that fact to the House. Such is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, to refuse the call so far as I have specified. But, sir, how is the motion supported by the argument of the mover, and by the argument of the gentleman over the way? They all tell you, we want all the facts—all the documents; but we would shut the door upon the opinions of the Secretary, or his arguments. I, too, want the facts and documents, and no opinions or arguments; and will not any gentleman perceive, who will take the trouble to read over that part of the resolution proposed to be struck out, that these arguments are directed against matter which has no existence in fact? Sir, is it argument or opinion, to furnish us with copies of the correspondence with the Governor of Tennessee? Is it argument or opinion to furnish a copy of the Executive order to continue the militia in service longer than three months? Or will it be said to be argument or opinion, if no Executive order exist, to certify that single fact to the House? Surely no gentleman will pretend it is either; yet we have heard much of a desire to give all the facts and documents, and to withhold only opinions. Let us have all the documents, and all the facts. How will the case stand before the country, if the motion prevail and gentlemen deny the information sought? We may be told, if the information obtained bears hard on any individual, that, if the whole correspondence between the War Department and the Governor of Tennessee had been published, the country would have found ample evidence to justify either the Governor, or any militia officer acting under him, for retaining the militia in question for six, instead of three months; and if we have not an express certificate from the proper officer, that no order of the President exists, it may be said, it has been withdrawn. I therefore want the whole information, correspondence, and documents. I wish an opportunity of judging for myself what they contain—to have the light shed upon my own mind, that I may form an opinion myself. I do not believe, Sir, for I could not impugn any man's motives, there can be a single gentleman on this floor, who would withhold the information sought for, if he understood the subject.

[Here Mr. W. yielded the floor, at the request of Mr. RANDOLPH, who said that, having been informed (by a friend) that he was under an error in regard to the shooting of the militiamen at Norfolk, last war, he wished to withdraw what he had said upon that subject. That, although he had derived his impression from a recent, and, as he had believed, an authentic source, yet he did not wish, under the circumstances of the case, for the allegation to go out to the world—and he was desirous to retract it, before it should have excited notice or remark.

Mr. W. resumed. I said, Sir, I did not believe there was a member in the House, who understanding this subject, would refuse the information asked, unless, indeed, on the ground that it could not connect itself with our Legislative duties in any way whatever. Sir, it is a matter of common interest and concern, for us and the country, to know how our laws are administered. The proceedings of our ordinary judicial tribunals, we are duly and regularly apprised of through the medium of the reports of cases which we provide for by law. It is not so with the proceedings of our Military and Naval Courts Martial. The records of their proceedings are returned to the proper office, and remain in deposit there. We have no means of ascertaining what they are, except by a call of the House for information. A knowledge of the proceedings of the Civil and of the Military Courts, is necessary to determine upon the propriety of altering or amending our laws. We should be made acquainted with the transactions alluded to, and with every thing connected with them, that we may judge of the necessity of altering or amending the laws and regulations governing our regular troops or militia. Let us have, Sir, in the language of the two gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. BELL and Mr. POLK] the whole of the correspondence and documents, and all the facts. Let us put a stop to all misrepresentation on this subject at once.

Gentlemen have seen proper to question the motives of my colleague and friend, the mover of the Resolution. Sir, I enter my protest against questioning the motives of any gentleman on this floor. I disclaim all personal or improper political motive for resisting the motion, and for supporting the resolution: and those who know my colleague—and I know him well—will be satisfied that the motives which govern him in the discharge of his legislative duties here, or his conduct elsewhere, are as pure, to say the least of them, as the motives of those gentlemen who question him, or as pure as the motives which governed the conduct of the distinguished individual whose character they seem so anxious to defend.

I repeat, sir, I am sure gentlemen cannot wish to withhold the information sought for in that part of the resolution proposed to be struck out, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, that he had heard it declared, on all sides of the House, that gentlemen want information; that they seek the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I wish this as strongly as any one; and because I want this, I don't want any speeches from the department. The gentlemen who profess to want the correspondence most, give to me the strongest evidence, by their speeches, that they are perfectly conversant with it. I shall not dive into their motives: that belongs to another power—a power from which this Administration once claimed its right to rule. I had, like others, hoped that we should have met to transact the public business; and that we should have agreed to leave this question to the People; but it is in vain to conceal the fact, that this House is intended to be made an arena on which to excite the passions of the People. We see an individual branded with reproach, for having consented to the execution of several militiamen—we who are nursed by the pap of the Treasury—it is no expression of mine—pap—it comes from the Treasury, of course it must be good—we are told that these are the proper scenes to engage the minds of men, and not the vulgar scenes of bloody war. At the same time we do see a General of the United States trying soldiers at Norfolk, and shooting them too, for desertion. I know it to be a fact: for I was an eye witness. A gentleman near me says, that these were not militiamen. I believe two of them were. I derive my information from a source entitled to at least as much credit, as if it was drawn from hired and pensioned letter-writers in one of the Departments. But, sir, if they were not militia-men, they were men; and is not the life of man dear? And are we now to be told that no regard is to be shown to the life of a common soldier? My information goes still farther. An order was issued by a United States' Commander, to go in pursuit of a deserter, and if he could not be taken, to shoot him, and he was shot. Why was not the same noise made then, that there is now, and why was not information of that fact laid before the House, by the same gentleman or his friends, who have stirred this inquiry? It is true I belong to the Committee on the Militia, but I have not been called upon to attend it, until this morning.

[A sentence, or two, of the speaker, here escaped the Reporter's ear.]

Sir, I have no doubt the Department of War is well regulated—that it has learned to profit by past experience, and that the Military Chieftain will find its discipline much better than it was some years ago. To that end I had proposed to move an amendment, calling for the number of deserters from the Army in 1825 and 1826. No doubt, this, also, will be valuable information on the bill to regulate the Militia.

Mr. WICKLIFFE now signified his agreement to the proposal of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL], to modify his amendment in such a manner, as to retain the call for the whole correspondence.

Mr. SLOANE also expressed his willingness to modify his resolution, by striking out the following words: "and if no such order exists on the files of the War Department, to state that fact to this House."

Mr. BURGESS expressed his regret that a simple resolution calling for information should have taken the turn this had. He understood that copies of documents could not be obtained from the Public Offices without a legal order, and he thought the regulation a good one. Under that regulation, it was impossible that the record called for by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SLOANE] should ever go to the public unless by the direction of this House, or of the Senate.

The question, said Mr. B. for us to settle, is, whether this information shall be laid before the House, and the public be enabled to know the truth as it is? What the ulterior intentions of the mover may be, is nothing to me; I shall vote for myself according to my own views of propriety—so, I presume, other gentlemen will vote; and, even if the rules of the House did not restrain me from a violation of decorum, I hope I should have civility enough not to impute, without evidence, to any gentleman in this House, motives hostile to the public peace and to the safety of individual reputation. It cannot be denied that much curiosity, to give it no other name, exists in the public mind, in reference to these papers. I have seen the evidence of it in those records, which, from our childhood, we are accustomed to consult—I mean the Chronicles of the day.

It is commonly said that certain militiamen have been executed, and it is said by some, that their execution had no legal sanction. The question whether that execution was legal or not, is one on which great anxiety prevails. The person under whose orders it is said to have taken place is a person of great consequence in this nation. He fills, at this time, a great space in the public eye, and occupies much of the public feeling, and I ask if it be courtesy in this House to interpose before the facts of the present case, any obstacle which may disappoint the public curiosity, (if it is to receive no better name) quickened as that curiosity now is, and anxious as the most manageable appetite. What courtesy will it be to lay your hand on a part of the documents inquired for, and to say, they shall not go to your constituents? Why will you withhold from them what either the friends of that distinguished individual, or, if you will, his foes, may desire to lay before this House? For myself, I should be satisfied if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SLOANE] should select one portion of the documents, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] should select another portion. I should be satisfied with their discretion, and would call for the whole. I would not, at least transmute this hall into an arena for gladiators. I think better of my country—of this House—of those opposed to me and those who are with me, than to apprehend that the sword of the gladiator, or the pistol of the assassin, is in any danger of being used, whether here or elsewhere, in consequence of our decision on a resolution like this. If there is any thing in this matter to produce exasperation, it must be the withholding, it cannot be the granting, of this call. The gentlemen who spoke with so much ardor of their illustrious friend, spoke only as a man should speak, when he supposes the character of his friend is in danger. But their zeal might well have been spared. The character of that illustrious man is not impugned. Nobody here has injured, or wishes to injure him. Why then should his anxious friends endeavor to forestall public opinion, or keep back from the public ear, the voice of truth? Why will they refuse to satisfy public anxiety? Why do they strive, with so much earnestness, to strike out from the resolution a call for the orders of the President, copies of which are said to be in the War Department? Why do they dread so much, if such copies are not there, that the Secretary shall say they are not there? What would gentlemen have? The public will believe the signature of the Secretary of War; for, prostrated as he has been, at least in the wishes of his enemies, still the American public will believe him, without an oath, while they remember that he belongs to the State of Virginia, although he be the Secretary of War, and a member of the Administration. May he not be permitted to say, if the fact be so, that he cannot furnish copies of any such orders, because they are not in his office? We want no commentaries, no glosses, no labored explanations. We want the record alone, and, if it is not there, we want him to certify that it is not there. Sir, what will, what must, the public think, if you prevent him from giving this certificate? I do suppose there are abundance of our citizens who know what the usual form of a certificate is, and if you put forth to the world a certificate in some unusual form, they will have too much acuteness not to perceive that you deny them the knowledge which they desire to have. I might beg gentlemen, for their own sakes, not to excite such irresistible suspicions in the public mind.

Mr. BUCHANAN now obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. WICKLIFFE, who, said, his desire was, that every fact connected with the six militiamen should be developed; he desired to keep back nothing. If gentlemen wished it, he would even consent to call for the celebrated letter of Harris, which so feelingly invoked the public sympathy last summer, if the original could be found in the Department of War. I will, said Mr. W., withdraw the amendment to strike out, and substitute a motion to insert a call for copies of two letters, written by the Secretary of War, to Governor Blount, dated the 11th and 31st January, 1814. They are short. I will read them as the best illustration of their character. [Here Mr. W. read the two letters, as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF WAR, 11th JANUARY, 1814.

"You are authorized to supply, by Militia drafts, or by volunteers, any deficiency which may arise in the Militia divisions under the command of Major General Jackson, and without referring, on this head, to this department. It may be well that your Excellency consult Gen. Pinckney, as he can best judge of the whole number necessary to the attainment of the public objects.

"J. ARMSTRONG."

"WAR DEPARTMENT, 31st JANUARY, 1814.

"Sir: I had the honor to receive your Excellency's letter, of the 5th instant. My letter of the 11th, will have anticipated your inquiries relative to the further detachments of Militia," &c.]

Mr. FLOYD now made some explanations, which appeared to be directed to one of his colleagues, but from his position, was not heard by our reporter with sufficient distinctness to attempt a report of it. He was understood, in conclusion, to state that of two men who were tried for desertion at Norfolk, one was a militiaman and one not, and that it was the soldier and not the militiaman who was shot.

Mr. SLOANE now signified his acceptance of the addition proposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, and the resolution, as thus modified, was finally adopted, in the following form:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a copy of the proceedings of a Court Martial, which commenced its sittings at or near Mobile, on the fifth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, for the trial of certain Tennessee Militiamen, together with a copy of all the orders for the organization of said Court, as well as those subsequently issued in relation to its decisions.

"And, also, to furnish copies of all papers, letters, and documents, relating to said Court Martial: copies of all orders, general or special, made or issued by the President of the United States, or by the Secretary of War, concerning or relating to the length of service of the detachment of the Tennessee Militia, detailed under the order of the Governor of said State, issued on the twentieth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and afterwards placed under the immediate command of Lieutenant Colonel Philip Pipkin; also, copies of such order, and of the muster and pay rolls of said Militiamen, which may be on file in the Department of War.

"And to furnish copies of any orders of the President or Secretary of War, by which, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the President by the 8th section of the act of 18th of April, 1814, the term of service of the Tennessee Militia may have been extended beyond three months; also, copies of two letters from the Secretary of War to Governor Blount, dated the 11th and 31st January 1814.

"And, also, to furnish copies of any correspondence in the War Department between the President or Secretary of War and the Governor of Tennessee, during the late war, on the subject of the time which the drafted militia of said State should be required to serve in the armies of the United States."

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1828.

The House was principally occupied this day in disposing of resolutions of inquiry, and discussing the general appropriation bill; which was ordered to a third reading.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18, 1828.

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive: and the question recurring on Mr. WHITTLESSEY's motion, pending when the bill was last before the House, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims; Mr. W. withdrew the motion.

Mr. GURLEY then moved to amend the bill, by adding the following:

"And that the further sum of $ 234 dollars be paid to the said D'Auterive, for the injury done to his slave while in the service of the United States; and for medical attendance on said slave."

Mr. KERR addressed the House to the following effect:

Mr. Speaker: From the serious aspect in which this subject is now presented to the whole nation—network standing the opinions first entertained, that it was of minor importance—I feel myself under a sort of moral necessity of assigning reasons for the vote I shall give. I am, sir, decidedly in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana. Although I was not very solicitous to obtrude myself, the other day, upon the attention of the Committee of the Whole, when I moved its rising, and when, after giving way for the explanations of a gentleman from New York, I was intercepted from the Chair by the precipitancy of gentleman who rose to speak, yet I confess that I did feel a desire to declare my opinion upon the question in debate, inasmuch as my constituents as well as those of others, who had delivered their sentiments at large, had a direct interest in it.

Our local situation—dwelling as we do on the waters of the Chesapeake, late the scene of a most vexatious predatory warfare, and always exposed, in time of war, to the loss of that very species of property which, in the case before the House, is attempted to be refined away—gives us an interest in the question not far short of that of Southern men. I am not, sir, a Southern man—strictly so called—but I feel, and my constituents feel drawn towards the People of the South, by chords of sympathy in many respects; and, in that particular interest which has now become the subject of controversy, even on this floor, we have a common stake. Although our concern in the subject is not, perhaps so important, yet the interest we feel in it is scarcely less vivid than that of the Southern planter. Sir, since the last speech of the gentleman from New York, in which he has portrayed the consequence flowing from the premises which he had, himself, most kindly assumed for the advocates of this measure—as leading to the destruction of all civil liberty in this country—I cannot content myself without an humble effort to refute the fallacies by which it is attempted to blind this House against the true import of the question before them.

It is (true, sir, (as had been before said by a gentleman on our side of the question,) the portion of Roman history selected by the honorable gentleman from New York for this occasion, was ably and eloquently recited by him; and yet, I must be permitted to say, that it was ill-placed, and without any just application to the subject: and I will endeavor to vindicate myself, in respect to the vote I mean to give upon this amendment, from the direful stigma, which the conclusion from his remarks might cast upon it. I entertain as great hatred of arbitrary power, exercised in any form and upon any pretext, as that gentleman: and it is precisely because I abhor tyranny, in every shape, that I would sedulously guard the citizens of this country from oppression, and would secure every individual against, or indemnify him for, all undue sacrifices to the public. I would, sir, resist as firmly as any man in this nation, the ambitious stride of a Dictator; and whenever the semblance of that kind of danger shall appear—whether it comes as a speck in the Eastern or Western horizon—let the gentleman sound the alarm, and I will plant myself by his side, and resist with him.

Although, sir, I will not undertake to impute to the gentleman from New York the bearing which has been attributed to his remarks by a member from South Carolina, yet I must endeavor to redeem myself and my vote from the effect of his conclusions.

[Mr. STORRS rose to order; and submitted to the Chair whether it was in order to answer in the House arguments offered in the Committee of the Whole.]

The SPEAKER said it was not strictly in order.

Mr. KERR. I will, then, sir, proceed, without any further particular reference to that gentleman. I meant nothing personal, though I acknowledge it was my special object to reply to his argument, and to deprecate every effect of it. I will go on to argue this point as one not inferior in importance to any which is to be agitated in the councils of this nation. The question has gone forth to the People, and you cannot now stop the current of the public mind upon it. No matter how needlessly it may have been brought up; no matter what disavowals or admissions gentlemen may now think it wise, or prudent, or liberal, to make; the question has been raised—whether slaves are property?—not in those general terms, I admit; but whether they are property in the view of this General Government, insofar as it may have power to affect them in certain exigencies of State, and in which the owner is to be indemnified for any loss or injury sustained by him thereby. And it is our solemn duty to meet and to decide it on the claim of the individual now petitioning for redress. It is because I regard this question as vital to the interests of a large portion of the citizens of this country, and of those too, whom I have the honor to represent, that I was opposed to the recommitment of the bill, and now advocate a decided vote in favor of this amendment.

Gentlemen now say, (some of them at least,) that they do not deny the general proposition that slaves are property; yet they do contend that, pro hac vice, they are not property, and they are not to be considered as such, when taken or lost or injured in the public service. Here then is the issue: We aver that slaves are property; so declared by law, and so held in the view of the Constitution. It is the report of this committee with the bill, which will make up the record of our judgment here; and if you had permitted this amendment to be dropped, because of the insignificant amount of the claim of Marigny D'Auterive, or now reject it, you establish a precedent, to be quoted on all future occasions, against the most important claims, and against redress for the most serious individual losses: and I have no doubt it would be set up by some as a solemn decision on record, that slaves are not property.

Although I am not now, it seems, at liberty to remark on what gentleman have said before the Committee of the Whole, yet I will proceed, and I will suppose arguments which may have been used, or might be set up; I will imagine reasons, but refer to no names. There is no other course left us for coming to the point. I repeat, Sir, that this is a question of serious import, and I am for meeting it in limine; and with my friend from Alabama, who offered his opinion in the beginning of the debate, I say now is the proper time to have it settled, and put at rest.

Many observations have been made by gentlemen in this House, to do away an impression that they would in any manner impugn the right of property in slaves; and it has been said that such a question will never be stirred until "some bold, bad man," shall raise it for the purpose of his own ambition. I feel happy in believing that this bold, bad man, has not yet found his way into this House; but I have made some note of the opinions and dispositions of men in different quarters upon this subject. Not alone in the East, or in the North, but in the middle States—aye, in the South, too, even without the instigation of that ambition which has been assumed as the only motive to it—bold, bad men, have had the folly, or the wickedness—call them fools or knaves, if you please, (as they have been so denounced by a gentleman from Virginia,) to avow and maintain that slaves are not property, and that all such pretended rights ought to be abolished. I trust that men of this description will be long kept from this place; but there is no question, they have been seeking, by stealthy steps, to make their way into the State Legislatures, for the express purpose of stirring, by slow degrees, the question of slavery, and, in due season, the solemn one of universal emancipation. You may call such people fanatics, hypocrites, or knaves, or by whatsoever other epithets

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

of reprobation you please, but all the while the fatal consequences of their principles and their movements, may spread and be felt in every part of the country. If such a character should ever show his face in this House, I trust there will be always here, men of firmness and talent, to make him toe the twig, and avow himself clearly, so that he may be held up to the scorn and detestation of every good man in the nation.

I confess, sir, that, being little accustomed to address the House, I have felt, on this occasion, much embarrassment: for, intending more particularly to reply to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York, and to plant myself against the efficacy of that Roman story which he had so eloquently narrated, but which he forbade me to touch, I have been obliged to turn the current of my thoughts, and have deviated into too many general observations. Sir, with whatever eloquence, and force, and solemnity, passages of history may be recited here, to warn us against future tyrants who may rise up amongst the People of this country; with whatever ingenious dress the sophistry of gentlemen may display itself, relying on the supposed ignorance and want of intelligence in this House, to detect what a "pigmy's straw can pierce," every member must be satisfied of the importance of this question, as to the security of the rights of private property, in general, though now presented in the humble claim of Marigny D'Auterive. The importance of the general principle in controversy, is the only justification for the long arguments used on this occasion, though I think that the claim is substantiated by the plain and clear principles of law.

Gentlemen here say that they do not deny the right of property in slaves; but the report of the committee does give color to, and in effect declares the doctrine to a great extent, and in so much destroys the rights of owners. They aver in effect that, as to the purpose in view, slaves are not property, or are not to be so considered. [Mr. K. here read the report of the committee of the present session, and proceeded.] I will not trouble the House with reading the report of January, 1826, referred to by the present committee, and adopted by them, as it must be familiar now to every member; but I will assert that the foundation of the report is an actual denial of the right of property in slaves. They say that slaves have not been put on the footing of property, and paid for when lost to the owner in the public service, and they report that this petitioner ought not to have relief. No matter how you disguise it, common language will be understood by the people, and they will consider a rejection of this amendment as a decision against the right of property to this extent; for the committee do aver, that, as to any claim to compensation for injury done to a slave taken for public purposes, such slave is not considered as property, and therefore not to be paid for. Now, sir, this is the very reason why I would now decide at once that they are property, and so to be considered, and settle the question forever. I stand upon the ground that slaves are property to all intents and purposes, and should be paid for as such, like every other species of property. I will not take upon myself to lay censure on an honorable committee of this House; but I must say that all the excitement which has been exhibited on this occasion, is owing to the mistaken views of their report.

If slaves are property, as admitted, why shall they not be considered as such? I will put the absurdity to this House: What is that which is property, and not to be considered such? Such refinements are not for us, sir. If gentlemen knew how this kind of thing is felt by those more immediately concerned, they might excuse my earnestness. If slaves be property, why should they not be so considered? These are convertible propositions; and they are property of a kind the most valuable and most exposed. Has any direct reasoning been offered, on general principles, or from the Constitution, to prove that though slaves are property, they are not to be considered such? Not a scintilla of reason has been presented to support the position. The only thing like argument which has been attempted, is the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTELLER] that it has not been the usage of the Government to pay in such cases; but all the instances he has cited, have been shewn to be inapplicable to the present. If they were applicable, I would, on that account, call upon the House now to come to a direct decision in this case, and settle the true principle. It has been urged that because the Constitution of the United States, with certain views, considered slaves as persons, they are but a qualified property, and therefore not to be paid for. You may seize the property for the public use—deprive the owner of the services of his slave, and carry him into danger even of the loss of his life, and if he be injured or destroyed, you will not pay! I will tell the gentlemen, in a word, why slaves are property: They are such in respect of the right of the owner to sell them; not like the relation between master and apprentice, or father and son, where there is a contract or a right to the temporary service—but it is the absolute power of disposing of the slave altogether, that makes him property. Again, sir, the owner of a slave pays a tax on him, as has been before enforced in this debate; and that is the peculiar badge of private property in relation to Government. The slave was property, sir, before this Government was formed—was such under the laws of the States, and was so declared by them, as he had been held by the inhabitants of the provinces before. This General Government found slaves the property of the citizens of the States, and its power cannot impugn the right. It shall not define property, but must take it as it was, and construe the Constitution, which enjoins compensation for it, when taken for public use, with reference to what is property in the States. If this Government takes slaves for the public use, in any emergency, it can only touch them as the property of the owner; not as citizens, for they are not such; and they cannot be enlisted as soldiers, or enrolled in the militia. They cannot be enlisted, because they are slaves, and cannot contract; and they cannot be enrolled in the militia, because the fundamental militia act of 1792, excludes all but free white males. An attempt has been made to do away this right of property, by comparing slaves with apprentices; but they are citizens, and participate in the rights and burthens of the Government, and are not property. The force of this suggestion, however, has been triumphantly put down by the gentleman from Louisiana, by the brief answer that, if there were any analogy, it might prove that the master of an apprentice was also entitled to remuneration for his loss, but not that the owners of slaves are not so entitled.

Not a single case has been presented from the acts of Congress, to shew that any principle has been established against allowing compensation for the loss or injury of slaves taken for the public use, without the consent of the owner. All the cases cited, were instances of the voluntary risk of the owners, except that of Purkill, whose slave, whilst impressed into the public service, was supposed to have contracted a fatal disease by working in the mud, and the claim for remuneration was rejected by a committee, on a nice distinction between direct and consequential damages.

The gentlemen of the committee, in this case, have kindly and humanely suggested, as the best scheme for obtaining compensation in these cases, to provide for placing slaves on the footing of a militiaman. I now, sir, enter my solemn protest against this suggestion, as I consider it an impeachment of the right of the slave-holder, under the existing Constitution and laws: for these provide for the case sufficiently—nay, expressly. Our slaves are property, and not citizens : and I will not consent to place them on the ground of free citizens. Such a scheme is directly against the policy of the General Government, as I have stated, and against the policy necessary to the salvation of certain States, which is to exclude them from the use of arms. And as it runs counter to the feelings of Southern men, so it is a mockery of justice as a remedy.

But it has been contended that there is no constitutional provision, nor any existing law, to authorize the Government, or its agents, to take private property for the public use, without a previous contract, and that, even in the exigencies of war, neither the Government nor its agents can seize upon a slave, in a case of imminent public peril, or necessity; and we are warned against recognizing the lawless acts of officers with epaulettes on their shoulders, lest it lead to tyranny. I would guard, sir, with as much care as any man, against the slightest infringement of individual rights; but this is a national question, which involves the essential means for the security and safety of this whole People, who must, in time of war, look to this Government for protection. In whatever unpopular light some gentlemen may attempt to place this necessary power, in time of war, I am of opinion that the Government may be justified, in the imminent peril of war, and for the public safety, to seize upon such private property as the exigency of the case demands. When the Constitution was formed, it did not profess to provide for every case, which no law can do : many things were left to the pre-existing principles of Government, which were known and established. The fundamental laws of society, in every regular Government, provides for the case in question : and the 5th article of the amendment to the Constitution is only declaratory of the rights of the citizens to just compensation, and affirms the existing power of Government. It is the rock of our salvation, as it is the means of general protection, under this Government, in cases of extreme public danger. This dominium eminens, or transcendental propriety, or, power, is necessarily incidental to Governments of every form, and it is most essential to a Republic, wherein the general good and public safety are to be always provided for; and in extreme cases, in which alone it is to be exercised, the necessity of seizing on private property must, for the time, be judged of by the Government or its officers. The power rests on the imminent necessity of the case. I will not cite authorities here, for these principles are mentioned and stated by all the writers on political law. But gentlemen call for a previous special law to be passed. Now, sir, put the case to a committee, or to any member of this House, and either the one or the other will tell you, that, for exigencies so various, no previous law can provide. Therefore, when, under this eminent power, the property of an individual has been seized by this Government for the public safety and use, (as acknowledged,) let him not be told that he must go to the epauletted gentleman for his damages in trespass.

I will, sir, put one case : A private dwelling is on the point of being taken by an enemy, which might give him a dangerous foothold, and our army should find it essential to its safety to drive out the inhabitants—though free citizens—and occupy the building, or even for the salvation of the People from a conqueror, to raze it, with all its beautiful gardens and improvements, to the ground. The act is of direful necessity; but such like cases are put and recognized by the writers to whom I allude. And what, sir, distinguishes this of ours from other Governments, but the better security which is afforded by it to the liberties of the citizens? And will you take away from it a needful power—one essential to the protection of the People in a period of war and danger—because, possibly, at some period, it may be abused? Shall we resign the essential means of the public safety, from a fear of the terrific ghosts of a Pompey or a Cæsar? Is it really expected, sir, that these shadows will alarm the minds of a free and enlightened Republican People? Who are we, sir, to whom these arguments are addressed? the Representatives of that People, presumed to know their rights, and to be always ready to guard them. And we are told that we must suffer the Government to be destroyed, or the People conquered, because there is no express provision in the Constitution for using private property for their safety, in case of great necessity; and that, because, perchance, in some future age, a tyrant may rise up amongst us, we must at once lop off the strongest arm of our security?

I will forbear further remark, and will only add, as to the many admonitions against an indulgence in warmth and feeling, that it unfortunately happens that all the cause for them is on one side, not on the other. Those who are interested immediately against the destruction of the individual rights in this species of property, are they who ought to speak and demand security for them. If the claim of this petitioner is supported by proper proof—which now is not denied—I humbly trust that the grounds and principles of the amendment will be recognized by a solemn vote of this House, and that we will not be turned away by a loose declamation, not applicable to the subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said, he would have been much better pleased with the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] if he had not endeavored to shield himself from the effect of the arguments of gentlemen, by insisting that, as his remarks were made in committee, they could not be replied to in the House. He thought, however, notwithstanding the device of the honorable member, he might be able to debate the question. The speech of the gentleman was in this morning's Journal; he had read it, and it now belonged to the public. He therefore proposed making a few remarks upon its most prominent features. And he felt the more solicitous, because it contained sentiments that ought to be met, and refuted if possible.

The honorable member objected to the doctrine, that private property could be legally taken for public use, unless full compensation was made at the time. He contended that the literal import of the provision in the Constitution, implied payment when the property was to be taken. Mr. S. said, if that was the true construction, the Constitution could not have continued until this time. It would have been no compliment upon the intelligence or prudence of those who framed it, or those who adopted it. But what clearly illustrates the obvious intent and meaning of the provision about private property, is, that it is found in one of the amendments to the Constitution—prepared, says the gentleman from New York, to keep Government in check. If, however, it had been devised for the purpose of demanding compensation at the time private property was taken, why does not the provision embrace that idea in distinct and positive terms? Amendments are drawn up with the view of correcting some oversights or omissions in the original instrument to which they are supplementary. They are always prepared with great care, to meet the object contemplated by the individuals proposing them. And as that amendment is wholly silent as to paying for private property as soon as taken, and particularly when the framers were moulding a provision of caution against the Government, as the honorable member alleges, it is a matter of irresistible inference that his construction is erroneous.

How many cases had the gallant men witnessed, who had carried their country safely through the Revolution, that warned them, as men enlightened by the history of the times, to reject the notion entertained by the honorable member. Nothing could have induced them to adopt such a clause. The payment for property in time of war must depend upon the circumstances of the case. In many instances the officer has no funds, or, if he should have funds, he cannot know how long he would wish to retain the property in his service—as in the instance of this slave.

Mr. S. said that he, therefore, felt emboldened in asserting, that, as the words about immediate payment were not to be found in the Constitution, it was right to take private property for the use of the Government, subject to valuation and future payment.

The next point in this case, Mr. S. said, referred to an imputation that had been indirectly cast upon another provision of the Constitution. The honorable member had censured Cicero for the following sentiment, which he had uttered on a certain memorable occasion: "Inter arma silent leges"—as eminently fraught with evil. He would have made the House believe, from his remarks, that the doctrine then advanced had never been heard of since, or recognized in any Government; that it had been exploded from that hour to the present—so alarming and dangerous was it in its nature. He contended that a People that favored such a doctrine were fit only to be slaves. Hear, however, what the sages of the Revolution, the fathers of the Republic—men ardently devoted to their country's prosperity, when deliberating upon this very point, decided. They resolved—and the People afterwards sanctioned their work—that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended, unless in a case of rebellion, or invasion, the public safety might require it. Thus it is manifest, that this sentiment, odious as it may be to the gentleman from New York, was adopted by this body of freemen, with General Washington at their head, who had ascertained what powers were necessary for the safety of the Republic. In these piping times of peace, when prosperity surrounds us every where, when no one dreams of war, we talk most valiantly against military power. Our form of Government was however designed for war, as well as peace. The ship upon the tranquil ocean represents our Constitution in times of repose. But when the storm rages, and the sea threatens her with destruction—when her mariners are seen throwing part of her cargo overboard, then we have some conception of the Constitution, agitated by the perils of war. If pressing necessities require prompt and efficient means to save the nation, it would be highly criminal not to resort to them. That the honorable member should have omitted, or forgotten, what is thus sanctioned by our charter of freedom, is rather strange.

By the way he proves the cowardice of Cicero in rather an unusual manner, by shewing that he anxiously pressed forward to meet his fate.

[The SPEAKER here suggested to Mr. S. that he could not follow the honorable member into his debate in committee.]

Mr. S. then said, he would advance his reasons in favor of the amendment, making compensation for the loss of the slave, occurring from his working at the entrenchments at New Orleans. In the course of the argument, some gentlemen had urged the propriety of paying for the time the slave was in the service, but did not feel disposed to go any further. He was willing to pay the loss the master had sustained. And it was a matter of no consequence to him, so far as related to his vote, whether the man was impressed, or was voluntarily sent by his master. To pay the owner for the hire of this slave was not in his opinion, "full compensation." He said he would sustain the propriety of his argument from the fact, that, although a soldier receives his monthly pay, yet, if he should die in the service, a pension is allowed to his wife. This is a matter of reparation. It is intended to be in the nature of an equivalent for the loss of one's services, upon which the wife looked for support. He said, if we applied this principle to the owner of the slave, who has lost his services, there can be but little difficulty in coming to a correct conclusion upon this subject. And that in his opinion, would be by voting for the amendment before the House.

Mr. SILAS WOOD, of New York, stated, that he should not have taken any part in this debate, if doctrines had not been advanced, against which he felt himself bound to protest. The case before the House is an application for compensation for property impressed for public use. Some gentlemen, in order to support the claim, have thought it necessary to justify the act of the officer, performed without legislative authority, as a legal act, which the Government is, of course, bound to indemnify. They derive the authority from that power, which resides in every Government, to employ, in extreme cases, the whole of the resources of the country, for its preservation. It is conceded that such a power exists; but it is denied that the Executive, or any subordinate officer, can exercise this power, without the authority of a law. None of the powers of Government can be exercised without the violation of the Constitution, until the exercise of them is authorized and prescribed by law. To contend that the Executive, or a subordinate officer, has a right, without law, to exert this authority, is to clothe him with legislative power—is to delegate the highest exertion of legislative authority with which we are entrusted, to a subordinate military officer. The doctrine goes to legalize the acts of the officer, done in violation of the most sacred rights secured by the Constitution. He may take what property he pleases; his will is his rule; and, whatever may be the occasion of the impressment, or the amount in value, you will be bound to indemnify the sufferers without inquiry.

Sir, it is by small encroachments that liberty is endangered. Grant this to be a legitimate power, without its being prescribed by law, and you admit a principle which destroys the guards which have been provided to secure personal liberty, and private property, and subvert the Constitution. A prudent and patriotic General will only resort to impressment when it is necessary to secure the success of the expedition he conducts. An aspiring commander will go further—and so, one after another, each enlarging the extent of his usurpations, till the abuse terminates in a military despotism. There was no necessity to resort to this desperate doctrine to sustain the claim to indemnity in the case before the House. There are cases in almost every war, in which the commander of the forces is obliged to take something from the owners, for the use of the service, to ensure the success of an enterprise. He impresses the property, assumes the responsibility of accounting to the owner, and relies on the justice and magnanimity of his country to appreciate his motives, and to indemnify the sufferers, and, in all cases where it appears the officer acted with good faith, he will be saved harmless.

Every impressment, without law, is still a trespass. It is so considered by the 33d article of our Military Law. It is so considered by the act of April 9th, 1816. This act, made to compensate such whose property had been impressed for public use, required, that every person who received compensation for property which had been impressed, should, at the same time, execute a release of all claims against the officer who impressed the property. The courts, also, in which suits have been prosecuted by those whose property had been impressed, against the officers who impressed it, have uniformly considered the act a trespass, and have awarded damages against the officer. The cases in which a commanding officer may find the success of an expedition to require that private property should be taken for public service, may be reduced to two classes; 1st, cases of obvious occurrence, which might be provided for, but for which no legal provision has been made; 2d, contingent cases, which could not be foreseen or provided for. Our Military law makes no provision for impressment of property. The British Mutiny act provides for billeting, and for the impressment of teams for the transportation of the army on a march.

The Colony of New York during the French war, authorized and regulated the impressment of certain articles of private property, which they foresaw would be necessary to the seasonable march of their troops to the scenes of action. Cases must occur, under the limited provisions of our act, where additional means to those which are provided, will become necessary to the success of a military enterprise. This was the fact in the case before the House. The enemy were in the neighborhood; an important city was threatened with conquest and pillage—to ensure the vigor and despatch necessary to complete the works of defence, to convey the cannon, ammunition, and provisions, to the ground, and to get the army in readiness to repel the enemy, it was necessary to put the whole physical force of the country in requisition. The petitioner's property was taken, and one of the slaves received material injury in the public service. The impressment is presumed to have been made in good faith, and for the public good; others, in like circumstances, have received compensation, and, in my opinion, the petitioner ought to receive the same treatment. I would never consent to indemnify for a wanton or unnecessary exercise of authority. There is no pretence that that was the case in the present instance, and indeed such cases will very rarely occur. The liability of an officer to remunerate the owner in damages for the property impressed, and the hazard of being refused an indemnity by Congress, in case the act was not palpably necessary, will generally afford sufficient security against the abuse of power.

The only difficulty in this case is to fix on a satisfactory rule of damages, or mode of compensation. If a jury of the vicinity had passed on the case, I should adopt their verdict. If any correct estimate can be made of what that would probably be, it may be proper to adopt that sum. If the amount of damages can not be satisfactorily ascertained, I know of no other mode of compensation but to treat the slave as a volunteer militiaman, and place him upon the pension list, with a pension proportioned to the degree of his disability. If any more eligible mode of compensation can be suggested, I shall be willing to adopt it.

Mr. EVERETT observed, that he did not rise for the purpose of entering into a detailed discussion of the question before the House, but to express in the simplest form in his power, the view he had taken of the subject, and the considerations, which would govern him, in giving his vote in favor of the amendment. In the first place, continued Mr. E., in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] professed himself unable fully to answer, I would observe, that it appears, from the original papers of the case, that the slave impressed sustained an injury from the fire of the enemy; that he was wounded in the left eye and left arm, deprived of his eye and permanently weakened in his limb; so that the injury suffered was the direct and not the consequential effect of the impressment. In answer to the other demand of the same gentleman, viz: for a measure of damages, I would farther observe, said Mr. E., that a tribunal, which I take to be the usual one in such cases, two or three neighbors, had testified that they conceived the owner of the slave to have suffered an injury, to the amount of the compensation now claimed. This testimony may be seen among the original papers of the case; which, though too long to be conveniently read, may be consulted by any gentleman, at the Clerk's table.

The real merits of the question, said Mr. E., may, in my opinion, be reduced to narrower limits than might be supposed, from the wide range of the discussion. The claim arises under that provision of the Constitution—that amendment of the Constitution—by which it is guaranteed that “private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation.” Now, sir, by rejecting this amendment, we virtually introduce into this provision of the Constitution, the qualification “excepting slaves.” We make it read, “nor shall private property, excepting slaves, be taken for the public use, without just compensation.” I am prepared to say, without scruple, that if, at the time of discussing and adopting this amendment to the Constitution, it had been proposed to insert such a qualification of it, it would have been fatal not merely to the amendment, but to the Constitution itself. I am willing to leave it to the candor and common sense of every gentleman, in the House, whether a proposition going, in effect, to say, that “private property, in slaves, might be taken for the public use, without just compensation,” would have been entertained for a moment, when the amendments to the Constitution were adopted.

There is, I own, continued Mr. E., one view of the matter, which struck me with some force, as an objection to the allowance of this claim. Admitting the principle, that property impressed into the public service is to be paid for, the measure of compensation is to be sought, in what would have been the terms of a contract, had the property been taken under contract with the owner and not impressed. Now it may be said, that no person hiring a slave, would insure his life, which we virtually do if we pay this claim. This objection, however, seems to me only plausible. Suppose the Mayor of New Orleans, instead of impressing a slave, had come to his owner, and proposed to hire him, would not the owner, in making his terms, have said, “this is no common case of service; you want the man, not to work in your garden or plantations, but on the lines, where he is to be exposed to the fire of the enemy, from morning to night. I cannot yield him, at the usual rate of wages; I must be paid according to the peculiarly dangerous nature of the service.” Such would be the language of the owner; and the least he would demand would be indemnity against the damage actually sustained; on the common principles of contracts, he ought to have more; he ought to be indemnified against the risk of the total loss of the slave. I therefore know of no better measure of the compensation, to which D'Auterive is now entitled, than that which is found in these documents—the judgment of the Physician—the opinion of the neighbors, that a loss to the amount claimed has been sustained: for it was sustained by the direct effect of exposure to danger, known to exist when the man was subjected to it, and against which his owner would have stipulated in a contract.

I cannot admit, said Mr. E., that the nature of the right of impressment, or, if you please, the quality of the act of impressment necessarily comes into discussion here. We are not now called to legalize (if I may use that word) the act, by which this property was impressed. We did that at the last session of Congress. We paid D'Auterive for his other property, taken at the same time. On the passage of the bill, making the appropriation for him, I do not find that a division took place. The Yeas and Nays do not appear to have been asked. I cannot find the name of either of my friends from New York [Messrs. WOOD and STORRS] on record against the allowance made to Marigny D'Auterive last Winter. It is therefore not now a question, whether we shall adopt the act, by which this man's property was impressed into the public service; but whether, having paid him for a part of it, and with a report from the Committee of Claims in favor of another part, we shall refuse to pay this remaining portion. If we do refuse, it must be on strong grounds, applicable to this particular part of the property. The preliminary question has been settled.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[JAN. 18, 1828.]

Mr. E. said he should not enter into the consideration of the precedents. Among all, which had been cited, there appeared to be but one of an impressed slave, and that one was not a case fully in point; because the injury sustained, although probably the effect of the exposure, was not certainly so. Granting, however, that it were fully in point, it would still make but a single precedent hitherto produced, against such an allowance as is now asked: an insufficient ground certainly for refusing to pay for a part of the property, while you pay for the rest.

The argument against this claim drawn from the analogy with the case of minors and apprentices, who might die in the military service of the country, said Mr. E., I heard with some pain. There seems to me no resemblance, scarce a shadow of likeness, in the cases. What, sir, shall we adopt an analogy, which would make the free citizen of the country, because he lacks a year or two of the term of legal majority, the property of his master! The most that can be said, is, that his master or father has a qualified property in his services; and this is balanced by obligations essentially reducing the value of that property, in a pecuniary view. Besides this, the analogy supposes what cannot happen. The minor and apprentice cannot be impressed into the service of the country. If they enter it at all, it must be after an act has been passed by the supreme legislative authority of the country, emancipating the son from the patria potestas, making the apprentice sui juris, and thenceforward competent to form with the country the contract of military service. When he has thus entered by contract into the military service of the country, he is there for himself, for his own rights as a citizen. No doubt such a law is an invasion of the interest of the parent or master, in the minor's services. The law, which has been referred to, recognized this, in assigning them a part of the bounty money; but it is a kind of interest, which, if extended to a claim for an indemnity in money, for the loss of the life of a free citizen, would be in opposition to the spirit of all our institutions.

The case of the slave impressed is totally different. The analogy fails in the most important points. He does not enter into the military service of the country by contract. He cannot contract. His master has not contracted for his slave. On the contrary, at a moment when, by the Laws and Constitution of the country, he is the property of his owner, the Government comes by force, takes him away, and destroys him in the public service. To make the case parallel, we must suppose an act of the Government emancipating the slaves, and enabling them to enlist in the army. Would any Government think of passing a law simply emancipating the slaves of its citizens, without making any compensation to their owners? Such an act would indicate a tyranny, as absolute as any that ever oppressed a people. It had lately been objected, with justice, by Lord Howell, to the views of those benevolent persons in England, who were contemplating the abolition of slavery, that they looked too much to the condition of the slave, and too little to the rights of the master; and that the ideas of emancipation and compensation ought to go hand and hand.

With respect to the dangers to flow from sanctioning the act, by which the property of D'Auterive was impressed, it is not now a question. We have already sanctioned the act, by making compensation for a part of the property. It will not be averred, that the interest of the master in his slave is more sacred, than his interest in any other and all other kinds of property. This argument proves too much. When a necessity of impressment exists, I know of no species of property that can be protected. In the extreme need of the country, it must be defended by all its physical means. We have sanctioned the act, by which our officer went into D'Auterive's enclosure, and took his cart, his horse, and his wood. Is it less dangerous to sanction this invasion of property, than an invasion of that in a slave? I know the power of impressment is the most odious in the world. It rests on the most odious plea; that of necessity, which knows no law. I would do nothing to extend it. I would do every thing to restrain it. But how shall we best limit and bound it? How can we do so more effectually, than by imposing a rigid law of compensation? How can we better heal the violated law of property, than by making fair payment of the injury sustained.

Mr. E. observed, in conclusion, that he had looked into the original papers, and found what he regarded as evidence of the impressment; he had found proof, that the injury arose from the fire of the enemy; he had found satisfactory evidence of the extent of the injury; and having already agreed to pay D'Auterive for a part of his property, he could not now consistently refuse to pay him for the remainder.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, said, he had not intended to say any thing in this case; but he owed it to himself to state his reasons, to sustain the vote he was about to give. But, after all the argument and eloquence they had heard on the subject, he would add but very little to the debate. He said, he considered that the right of the master in the slave was founded solely in the municipal law of the place, and he was bound to respect the right, as assured by the laws of the State where this relation is recognized, and disclaimed all right to interfere with it on the part of the General Government. The subject was exclusively within the competence of the States where slavery exists, and this Government has no authority or power over it. Still, there was a distinction between the right of the master in his slave, and that of the owner of other subjects of property. The right of the master rests solely in the municipal law of the place, and is limited to the jurisdiction of the State. If the slave, therefore, pass out of that jurisdiction, and into a Government which does not recognize this kind of property, the right of the master falls, there being no law to sustain it. Not so with other property. This is founded in a principle of universal law; and the right of the owner is recognized and protected in every civilized country. It was on account of this distinction that the holders of slaves thought an express provision necessary in the Federal Constitution, in order that they might reclaim them when found in States where the municipal law does not authorize this kind of property. If this property had rested on the same foundation as other property, no such provision would have been necessary. The owner might have taken it under the universal law, as he might other property, or might have found redress in the Courts in the like manner. It belongs to the municipal law to settle relations between individuals—to regulate the rights between private men. The right of the Government over the person, and to the property of the citizen, pertains to the public law, or, as it is sometimes called, the law of empire.

I am not prepared to say that it is not competent for this Government to provide by law for calling out this description of persons for the defence of the country. It pertains to all sovereignty to defend the territory and the people, and all the strength and resources of the country, are put at its disposal to enable it to fulfil this duty. Will any one say that it was not competent for these States, in case of imminent danger, before they became a party to the Federal Government, to call out this description of persons, and to form them into a military force for the public defence? I believe this expedient has been resorted to in great exigencies, in all countries where slavery has existed. If the defence of the country then has been devolved upon the Government of the United States, I am not prepared to say that it has not a strict right to resort to this kind of force for the necessary defence. It would be one of the last expedients, however, to which I would be willing to resort. But, suppose such a force brought into the field, would this Government be obliged to pay for all that might be killed in battle? I trust not. It would be beyond the resources of any country. A single regiment might create a burden upon the Treasury of a million of dollars. But, said Mr. A. the claim of the master is not sustained by any principle of law applicable to the case. When the slave is impressed into the public service, the relation created by the municipal law is suspended between him and his master, and he is brought under the public law which regards him as a person and not as property—subjects him to discipline, and makes him answerable for his acts, and punishable for his delinquencies. Government had at all times a direct and paramount right to the services of this description of persons. They owed this duty to Government, and the property of the master was always subject to it. The Government then is not bound to pay the master for his slave killed in battle, or for any injury he may receive. Mr. A. said, he would not deny to the Government the right of impressment, yet no provision could be made before-hand to vest any of its officers with a discretion in the exercise of it. But there were cases of extreme necessity, and this at New-Orleans was one of them, when the commanding officer of an army in some sense represents the whole Sovereignty, and might command all the resources in his power for the defence of the country. But this did not impart any strength to the master's claim for indemnity. It must stand on its own basis, and not on the character of the act by which the damage was occasioned.

If compensation were given in this case, it might form a dangerous precedent. The slave-holding States would be slow to recognize it. Suppose some commander of an army, from a different part of the Union, and, on that account, with less of their confidence in this particular, should resort to this expedient, and impress slaves into the military service, would it not create great sensibility in the Southern States? Would they consent to it? Mr. A. said he would wish to remunerate the sufferer for any loss he might sustain in the needful defence of the country, yet it would be hazardous to recognize the principle involved in this case: that it was not required by justice or policy, and might be dangerous to liberty and property.

Mr. HALE, in rising to offer a few remarks on this question, expressed his hope that no other apology would be deemed necessary, than the fact that he was the only Representative of a State which was deeply interested in the decision to which the House should come. It was natural, therefore, that he should feel some interest, and also, that his constituents should feel some anxiety while this discussion is progressing. It was natural, he said, from his local situation, that he should feel, and that his constituents should also feel, concerned in the principle involved in the amendment proposed. It was natural, too, that, as he was the only Representative from the State, his constituents should expect that he would, at least, utter, on this occasion, something of what he knew to be their feelings and wishes. It was his duty to convince this House, and his own constituents, that he was not regardless of the interest intrusted to his care. He rose principally for the purpose of urging, at this late hour, a decision of the question, as he was satisfied in his own mind, that the opinion of every gentleman was made up; and that there are other and great interests to be consulted, that are now delayed by this protracted discussion. He would ask if any good result is expected to grow out of the discussion of matters, foreign to the question, and that have no reference to it? He remembered, that when the memorable Missouri question was agitated, and discussed, with all the excitement that grew out of it, that the hopes of the slaves for freedom were strongly excited—excited in some States even to rebellion, of which melancholy examples were the consequence. He would not say, that some of the language used and uttered in this debate might spread the same contagious influence abroad, even to that region of country, in whose peace and welfare he should always feel a lively interest. To avert a calamity like this, was his principal inducement for trespassing on the time of the House. Sir, the hopes of the slave for freedom may be inspired by gentlemen, without knowing that they only add another link to the chain that fetters this population; they only add to that quantum of misery that the People of the South have attempted to mitigate, by kindness.

No gentleman has, he believed, pretended to deny the validity, and the sacred and unqualified right, of the slave owner. This was admitted on all sides. But, in order to resist the claim, gentlemen say, and so do the Committee, that this "species of property" is not a fit subject for indemnity; and that the Government have never regarded slaves as property. I will not condescend to argue on such a proposition; I will not condescend to argue the fact, whether slaves are property to the master, or ever were regarded by the Government as such.

The only true question seemed to him to be, whether the officer, under the exigencies of a state of war, may not impress the private property of the citizen? I place slaves on the same footing as other property. You can make no distinction, and all the arguments in the world would not weaken this position—a right consecrated by the Constitution—protected and defined by the municipal laws of the several States. On this question, no reasonable man can hesitate for one moment. The right of impressment has been admitted by this House for many years, in the payment of various claims of individuals for property impressed. Will we stop to inquire into the motives that operated on the mind of a military commander, invested and clothed with all that power that springs from a state of danger and alarm—that power, that originates from necessity, that knows no law—will we stop to ask, at such a moment of danger as that, whether the impressment of property for the public service, to contribute to the general good, was justifiable or not? What! when that city, which is the key of all our Western States—I might say of this empire—was at stake, threatened with the most terrible evils from an invading foe, was it an hour to cavil about law? Necessity dictated laws for that occasion, and the result convinced the world, that the means employed were honorable.

Sir, said Mr. H., I will not go home and tell my constituents that I deemed their rights of property so precarious as to justify me in their defence. I would as soon discuss a question, whether the wool which grows on the sheep of our Northern brethren (about which we have lately heard so much, and shall soon hear more), belongs to the farmer who rears it. This right of property is sacred in every State. It cannot be touched by this House—it cannot be reached in its legislative capacity. It is beyond the jurisdiction not only of Congress, but of the Federal Government. It is a subject exclusively of municipal regulation—and if the State of Louisiana declares that slaves are property,

Retrenchment.

this House must recognize them as such. If a Federal officer has seized upon the property for public use, the owner can demand compensation, under that clause of the Constitution which says, "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation."

It has been said that there is no authority vested in any officer, that authorizes him to impress slaves; and that the officer who does so is a trespasser. He might be deemed so on any trivial occasion. But, sir, would you, under the circumstances in which this impressment was made in this case, consign your officer to the ignominy of a trial; and force the party aggrieved to seek redress and damages from the gallant defender of his country? A gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] says, if the officer had been prosecuted by the civil authorities, and the damages ascertained by a jury, he would vote for the claim. Such a rule has never been required in any former case. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, it would have been ungenerous to have turned the defender of his country over for trial, and perhaps have him mulcted in a heavy fine, and then throw him upon this House for indemnity and release from the judgment. I hope we will never imitate the ancients in their treatment of their benefactors. We have too much generosity to consign our deliverers to a prison, and leave them to the fate of Miltiades. He trusted such a principle would never be adopted by this House.

The interest, Mr. H. said, he felt on this occasion, is perfectly natural—it may result from his education, his habits of thought, and from his situation as the representative of a People who are deeply involved in the consequences of your decision. If this House is about to say that private property can be taken for public use without just compensation, then the People have mistaken the Constitution under which they live. I perfectly agree with the sentiment just expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] that, if such an exception had been expressed, as the one contended for by the Committee of Claims, when the Constitution was presented for adoption, it never would have been ratified; and our voices would not have been heard to-day in this hall. He had too high a regard for the feelings and character of the House, and too much reliance on the integrity and justice of its members, to believe, for one moment, that they will sanction a distinction attempted to be made between the property of citizens of different sections of this Union. He did not believe we had reached this state of things at this time. He would never despair of the Republic until the attempt was really made to draw such a line of unjust and odious distinction—till the rights of one portion are sacrificed to the ambition or avarice of another. In conclusion, he would say, emphatically, that he would not despair, so long as the rights of his constituents were regarded, and preserved from any unhallowed grasp. For himself, he would undertake, on such a question—and the time may come, when he should feel himself justified to use the language of Hotspur—and that, too, with arms in his hands.

[Here the debate closed for to-day.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1828.

As soon as the Journal of yesterday was read,

Mr. SWAN, of New Jersey, rose, and addressed the House to the following effect:

Mr. SPEAKER: It has become my painful duty to announce to the House the melancholy intelligence of the death of GEORGE HOLCOMBE, late a Representative from New Jersey.

To the Members of this House, and especially those who have had the satisfaction of a personal acquaintance with the deceased, no eulogium can be necessary from me.

Exhausted by the pressure of a protracted but anyielding disease, he sunk into the embrace of death, on the morning of the 14th instant.

To his family, sir, the loss is irreparable—the affectionate husband and the kind parent is no more.

Mr. S. then moved the following:

Resolved, That the members of the House of Representatives, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. GEORGE HOLCOMBE, late a member thereof, will go into mourning one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape round the left arm.

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be directed to notify the Executive of New Jersey of the vacancy in the representation of that State, by the death of GEORGE HOLCOMBE.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted;
And the House, thereupon, adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 21, 1828.

No business, giving rise to debate, was transacted this day.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1828.

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. CHILTON moved the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to discharge the National debt, without unavoidable delay; to accomplish which desirable object, a resort to a general system of retrenchment is necessary. This, it is conceived, can only be effected by

First. A judicious reduction of the number of officers receiving salaries or pay from the General Government, and of the salaries of such as are necessarily retained in public service: avoiding, in each instance, the adoption of any measure which would be incompatible with our national dignity.

Second. By avoiding each and every appropriation or expenditure of public money which is not imperiously demanded by the justice of the claim, or the necessities of the Government, with a view to its efficient operation in a spirit of republican simplicity and economy.

2. Resolved, That the matters and things contained in the foregoing resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report to this House what offices, in their opinion, may be most advantageously discontinued, what salaries will reasonably bear reduction, and such other means of retrenchment as to them may seem necessary.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. McDUFFIE (Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means) said, that he should be glad to hear some specifications of the objects to which the mover of the resolution wished to direct the Committee's attention. He should be sorry if the Committee of Ways and Means should be obliged to revise the whole system of Government of the United States, the Civil Department, the Army and the Navy. The abstract propositions in the resolution were certainly just. It was very desirable that the unnecessary expense of Government should be reduced; that the public debt should be paid; and that economy in the public expenditures should be promoted. But really, as the resolution now stood, he should feel at a loss where to begin, or where to end. If the honorable gentleman wished to diminish the number of military officers, he ought to have directed an inquiry by the Committee on Military Affairs. If he was desirous of reducing the number of officers in the Navy, or rather, of preventing their unnecessary increase, the resolution ought to have been sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs; but it did not appertain to the Committee of Ways and Means, to say, whether the several branches of the public establishments were, or were not, too large.

Mr. CHILTON, in reply to Mr. McDuffrie's inquiry, and in support and explanation of his proposition, rose, and addressed the House as follows :

Mr. Speaker : The resolutions which I have just had the honor to submit, contemplate, in the first place, the establishment of one grand national truth—a truth, indeed, of axiomatic character, to wit : that a national debt is a national curse, and should, hence, be liquidated and discharged with all convenient despatch. This doctrine is, indeed, not only unlike, but the reverse of that which has been again and again contended for by some members of this community: and which, to some extent, it would seem, has received our sanction, by our conduct ; but experience, the most trusty of all monitors, has at last exploded the heresy, and the American People begin to look with fond concern to that shrine, upon which they will be able to proclaim themselves politically, civilly, religiously, and morally free.

The remainder of my proposition divides itself into three parts. The two first are mere specifications under the general maxim, first attempted to be established, and designed to designate the means by which its object can be accomplished. The third relates merely to the Committee of this House to which the whole subject-matter should be referred. To each of these considerations I shall attend ; but, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained, by a remark which fell from my honorable friend from South Carolina, [Mr. McDuffrie] to invert, to some extent, the order in which I should have considered them, and first to speak of the Committee to which the reference should be made. The gentleman has said, that the Committee of "Ways and Means" is already oppressed with business, and would have, perhaps, not sufficient time to devote to an undertaking so elaborate—one, indeed, which, from its character, furnishes neither a point at which to commence nor conclude the inquiry. Sir, I am conscious of the many difficulties which ever will attend this inquiry ; hence, I am bound to agree with my friend when he says that it will be a work of much time and great labor. Great will be the labor attending the investigation, but greater far the necessity which exists for it. I can assure the honorable Committee to whom I have proposed this reference, that, so far from designing to accumulate burdens upon them—and so far from my propositions being dictated by any unkind feeling towards them—it was designed and it should be considered one of the strongest marks and most conclusive proofs of my regard for its members, and confidence in their entire capability to prosecute so difficult, so unpleasant an inquiry, through all the mazes which will necessarily attend it. I would further remark, sir, that I have examined the rules of this House, and am satisfied that to one of two Committees the resolutions must be referred—for example to that named, or to the Committee on "the Public Expenditures." I have chosen the former without the slightest disposition to reflect on the latter, believing, in addition to what I have already urged, that the investigation or inquiry falls strictly within the pale of the authority of the first as defined and marked out by your rules. I have proposed a reference to a standing Committee, Sir, for another reason. It is that those Committees are generally made up of the most experienced and able members of the House—of such as are experimentally acquainted with the vast machine of Government, and can the more easily detect that part which fails to perform, or performs badly its duty ; or which operates as a detriment to the general scheme.

I, sir, from the remote distance at which I have been reared from the seat of Government—the seat of authority and patronage—could not be expected to comprehend, in all its parts and in all its minutia, a system so complicated. I have nevertheless, with the advantages of an humble education and but limited opportunities, been able to discern that public confidence is often abused, and public money incessantly squandered, by means, and in shapes, beyond my numbering.

Sir, I am conscious that, as a young man, and a new member of this honorable body, to its lenity alone I shall be indebted for the devotion of a few moments of its time to a view of this subject, which, when submitted by me, must stand or fall upon its intrinsic merits or demerits. A suggestion has been made, that, in submitting a resolution of this character, I should specifically name the officers whose services I would dispense with, the salaries I would reduce, and the expenses I would curtail. All this would I do : and more if in my power : But, sir, if I were able to do this—the necessity which exists for a reference at all, would be altogether superseded. I could then move on with a bill, directly embracing my views—but, in the present case I am situated as is the physician, who knows his patient to be diseased—yet knows not where the disease is located, nor the remedy which will heal it.

Mr. Speaker : In relation to that part of my resolution which supposes the existence of a greater number of officers, who are receiving pay or salaries from the Government, than are necessary to attend to its concerns, I am guided and influenced by the long list which is annually presented to this House. I am further influenced in the formation of my opinion, by information received from various sources, entitled to my confidence and to the confidence of the nation, that there are many sinecures in office; men, sir, who, to give the plain English of the matter, are feasting and fattening upon the Treasury : rendering, in the mean time, no services, nor, indeed, having any to render to the country. If gentlemen seek for specifications under this general remark, (as it may be considered,) I would observe, that I am informed our Navy list is crowded ; that, at West Point, perhaps, from thirty to fifty Cadets have been educated at the expense of the government, who are wholly destitute of employment; that a fifth auditor was appointed for a time which has of course passed away, and under circumstances which exist no more, nor longer require his intervention or aid ; and, indeed, that, in most of the public offices, more clerks are employed than are necessary to transact the business of them respectively—some receiving pay from public appropriations ; others from the "Contingent" Fund. If, upon these subjects, I am correctly informed, I cannot hesitate to say, that reform or ruin will constitute with us the closing scene. To satisfy my own mind, sir, unaided upon these subjects, is utterly out of my power. For, if my inquiries relative to them are answered by either persons or papers, I am bound to consider it a matter of courtesy rather than of right, having no official power to approach either. My object, then, can only be attained by instituting such an inquiry as this, and by a reference of it to some committee bold enough to encounter in the investigation a thunder storm of opposition, though its bolts should be hurled by even the Great Head of the Heads of Departments. As my object, Mr. Speaker, is to be entirely brief, my remarks already made, must suffice upon that branch of the subject noticed.

It, in the next place, becomes my duty to allude, at least, to salaries which, in my opinion, would reasonably bear reduction. Here, sir, though, I hope, with honest motives, I am situated differently from some of my friends upon this floor. They insist that they know not where to seek a beginning point, nor in what region to look for a salary upon which to commence the work of operation of reduction. I, on the other hand, know not what part of the body politic is most infected, and demands the most speedy remedy. If, however, sir, I am compelled to particularize, I present the long list of salaries as fit subjects for amputation. Amongst the rest, I must not neglect to bestow a more specific, though a passing notice, upon the pay received by Members of Congress, who are sitting here at their ease, receiving eight dollars per day for their services, and eight dollars for each twenty miles travelled, in reaching and returning from the seat of the General Government. This sir, is the last modification of the ever memorable "Compensation Law." Previous to the passage of that act, Members of Congress received, for their services, only six dollars per day. We had then councils as wise and dignified as at present; and I doubt not that we should again see our Legislative Halls filled with honorable and intelligent men if the compensation were reduced. A reason, and a strong one too—for this reduction, is found in the fact that our country is oppressed, and that the fruits of domestic industry, instead of price, command a mere pittance; not half so much as when aspirants for seats in Congress filled the ranks, as mere volunteers, without the formalities of a draft.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[JAN. 22, 1828.]

The only remaining branches of this subject which I am bound to notice, relate to the importance of avoiding unnecessary expenditures of public money, for our own accommodation, and to the necessity which exists for the exercise of caution and prudence, in making appropriations to meet the claims of others. If it be demanded of me to know, what departure from the rules of republican simplicity and economy I have witnessed here, and which I conceive to fall subject to the first of my two last divisions, by way of answer I can only request you, Mr. Speaker, to cast your eyes around this spacious Hall, each morning, upon entering it—see upwards of 200 tables piled with printed documents—private or local matters—interesting, perhaps, only to one solitary individual in the whole Union—a string of affidavits, certificates, letters, or depositions, accompanied by a report as long as the Moral law; yet all must be printed! This matter, which gentlemen may consider unimportant, is, to my mind, a crying evil. Members from the East, and North, and South, may, from the circumstance of their having been rocked in cradles of luxury and ease, think it a small matter to expend small sums of public money. But, sir, the Western People, particularly that portion of them whom I represent, have, upon the subject, but one voice; it is, so far as I understand it, that which I have spoken. They have liberally contributed to the support of your Government in peace—they have nobly defended it in war—and are, therefore, entitled to their weight upon this floor. I say, in their name, that we are gliding imperceptibly down the smooth and deceptive current of extravagance and prodigality, and steering, without a change of course, directly to the port of National Bankruptcy and ruin. This argument, sir, gentlemen may attempt to answer, by insisting that my picture is too gloomy—that we are prosperous—that universal peace prevails—that our nation is powerful—and that, therefore, we may indulge to some extent, in extravagance. Permit me, sir, to suggest, that industry and frugality, not indolence and prodigality, are the legitimate parents of national prosperity; and that financial ability preserves peace—and that the worst of all independent conditions, in either peace or war, is that in which a nation is placed, "having nothing to depend upon."

Mr. Speaker, I must close with but a few additional remarks. In the present condition of our national affairs, having all the advantages of revenue, derived from the duties upon imports and tonnage, as also from the sales of public lands, and other incidental sources of revenue—we can just struggle on, gaining nothing upon the current, if it gains nothing upon us. But, sir, should the dark cloud of war gather over our heads, and begin to burst in loud thunders upon our happy country—particularly when our commerce shall, by its effects, be cut off, and our public lands exhausted—let me entreat gentlemen to inquire how, and where, they will obtain money to support the Government, seeing that we wade deep in time of peace and prosperity.

Sir, by the course which I have taken upon this occasion, I may expose myself to the censure of members upon this floor. If so, I shall greatly regret it: as my object is, to promote my country's happiness, not to injure even its humblest supporter. Upon this occasion, I have discharged a duty which I owe to my constituents—redeemed a pledge which I conscientiously gave them; and having so done, with the most grateful feelings to the House for its polite attention, I take my seat.

[The hour for the consideration of resolutions having expired, the House proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day.]

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. GURLEY—

Mr. INGERSOLL said it had not been his intention, originally, to take any part in this debate. But as the discussion had gone on, so many different views had been presented, and many of them so different from his own, that he was induced to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while he submitted the reasons which would govern his vote. Notwithstanding all that he had heard—and he had listened attentively to most that had been said—he was unable to perceive that either the Constitution of the United States, or the angry question whether slaves are property or not, had any necessary bearing upon the case that we are called upon to decide. The Constitution had, indeed, declared, after providing that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation. Private property may be taken: by whom? Unquestionably by the Government, to whose use it is to be applied. But it is assuming the main point in dispute, to say that a military officer of this Government, who, from the very nature of his appointment, must, and he hoped always would be, held strictly subordinate to the civil power, can, at his discretion, appropriate the property of the citizen to the use of the army, until it can be shown that we have imparted to him this high attribute of sovereignty, which has been confided to the Federal Government. It is not enough to show that the power of converting private property to public use, is entrusted to this Government, you must go further, and show that the legislation of Congress has delegated to our officers the power which the States of this Union have placed within our control. You must not only show the existence of this power in the Constitution, but you must show that it has been exerted in the given case. Between the article in the Constitution, which has been so often alluded to, and the officer who assumes the power contained in it, there must be a connecting link, an act of Congress, or he cannot touch the property of a citizen, either in the emergencies of peace or war, without being a trespasser; he must forever remain alone responsible, unless we ratify and adopt as our own, what we have refused to authorize by previous legislation. The Judiciary Committee have already informed us, in a report now on our tables, that it is inexpedient to define by law how, when, and under what circumstances, property of a citizen may be taken for public use; and the proceedings of Congress may be searched in vain to find any act confiding either to its military or any other agents, the alarming powers which have been contended for during this debate. Whenever Congress has acted on the subject, it has been always on the supposition that the seizure was a trespass; they have preferred that method of meeting different cases as they arise, rather than, by any general law, to place the property of the citizen at the discretion of a military commander. Why are we called upon to pass an act of indemnity now, but for the fact, that the seizure was unauthorized by any previous provision, and consequently a trespass?

But, further: The act of 1816, providing payment for property impressed into the public service, and lost during the war, in its very terms recognizes an impressment only as a violation of private right. The sixth section of the act declares, that, in all cases where a recovery has been had, against the officer, by the owner of the property impressed, the amount so recovered shall be paid to the officer, instead of the owner; and, in all other cases, the person whose property has been taken, before he is paid, shall execute a release to the officer. Why did that act presume that a recovery might be had, if the Constitution had already authorized every military officer under it, to take private property for public use?

If the article referred to had never been added to the Constitution, it is admitted on all sides that the seizure of property by an officer would constitute a trespass: and he had already shown, by the terms of the law of 1816, that similar acts were considered trespasses still. He felt, therefore, warranted in repeating what he had asserted at the outset, that this article of the Constitution had no necessary connexion with the case before us. The impressment—if it was an impressment—would have been a trespass, had this article never existed; and, in the absence of any legislation, this part of the Constitution, standing by itself, does not make that right which was previously wrong.

There may be, as there frequently had been, many cases of the impressment of property, in which it was highly expedient for us to interfere and grant relief; but our interference should always be governed by sound and safe principles of legislation, and not based upon the dangerous doctrines which had been pressed upon us, to induce us to interfere here. He would always protest against the principle that the seizure by a military officer, unless previously authorized by law, created a corresponding duty on our part to respond in damages for the injury suffered. When we make a grant for an individual injury thus sustained, we do it as a gratuity, not in payment of a debt.

There might be difficulty in determining how far Congress had hitherto felt disposed to go, in granting relief to those who had suffered in their property, by its being taken for the use of the army. But he believed he was safe in saying that Congress had never, since the existence of the Government, so far countenanced the propriety of impressing our slave population into the military service of the country, as to adopt as its own the act of any officer who had taken this responsibility upon himself. And he believed that the owners of slaves, generally, had themselves acted upon the supposition that the Federal Government, in the exercise of its functions, either in peace or war, could not interfere with slave property against the owners' consent, either for the defence of the country or otherwise. Certain it is, that, although slaves have frequently been employed by our officers, yet but six instances could be found where any application had been made to Congress to so far sanction the proceedings, as to pay for the loss sustained; and in every one of those cases we have refused to interfere. The fifth section of the act of 1816, to which he had before alluded, directed "that, where any property had been impressed, or taken by public authority, for the use, or subsistence of the army, during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof," &c. It was notorious that many slaves were impressed for the use of the army, and lost or destroyed in the service, but he had never heard that their owners thought of applying to the commissioner appointed under that act, while it was in existence, for the value of their slaves thus lost. In 1819, (if he might be excused for alluding to what had taken place in the Senate,) although that honorable body had directed one of its committees to report in favor of one of the cases which was cited the other day by an honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WATTELESBY] yet, when a venerable Senator from North Carolina, at the same time, proposed that a committee should inquire into the expediency of paying for all slaves that had been impressed into the public service during the war, the Senate negatived the proposition, by a vote of 22 to 12; eight or nine of the majority thus refusing being from the slave-holding States. It was fairly to be inferred from these facts, that the practice had uniformly been against the use of slaves in the military operations of the country.

Unless he was greatly deceived, the principles advanced by the advocates of the present claim would, when carried to their full extent, be extremely troublesome to those who now seem to be the most anxious for their adoption. These principles imply that the Federal Government can separate the slave from the master, without the consent of the latter, upon paying such compensation as the Government itself may deem just. If slaves can thus be taken in time of war, they can in peace. When a proposition was submitted, some years ago, to the Senate, to appropriate a part of the public lands as a fund for the purchase of slaves, with the consent of the States in which they reside, we all recollect the excitement which the assertion of such a power created; and, yet, what was it more than a proposition to consent to what the Government might consider the public use of slave property, when paying a "just compensation?" It was then asserted in the public press, and in the halls of legislation, that the subject was one to which the power of the General Government did not extend. But, in the heat of this debate, we have again and again heard doctrines infinitely stronger and bolder in their consequences than those contained in the proposition to which he had alluded.

If, however, the precedents in similar cases should be so far reversed as to justify our paying for slaves when in the military service, there was no principle, even in regard to payments for other species of property, that would justify our allowing the present claim. The act of 1816, which was framed with great care, went as far as Congress ever had gone in remunerating individual loss. But that law provided only for property lost or destroyed, not injured. Let the practice be once admitted that we are to pay for property which becomes injured, but is restored to the owner, and there never will be a case where the property has been used, but the Government will be called upon to pay for extraordinary injuries. The act of 1816 was, therefore, positive in its provisions, that the property should be lost or destroyed. Unless, therefore, slave property is to be put on a more favorable footing than other property, this claim cannot be allowed. The true doctrine on this subject was, that we are to pay for the services we received—not for an injury which is incident to the employment. We do not become the insurers of the lives or the health of those whom we employ; the only obligation that can be created, is, to render a fair equivalent for their services; but, in no view of the case, could he see that we were bound to pay for this claim as now presented which is not for the services, but for the injury received in the service.

MR. MARTINDALE said he had been in the habit of thinking that the objections to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana steered clear of all the consequences and alarming results so uniformly offensive to our Southern brethren. Sir, said Mr. M., there is no legitimate excitement in this subject. The question of slavery—of the right of property in persons—the nature and extent of that property—and the manner of using or abusing it, is not drawn into discussion; and does not, in the least affect the principles upon which this claim is refused. Slavery exists. We know it: It is a matter of fact; matter of history; and matter of law; and Congress has nothing to do with it. The Constitution has granted it no power over the subject. So service in other forms is a matter of fact and of law. There are other relations of persons besides that of owner and slave. There are those of master and servant, master and apprentice, guardian and ward, parent and child, husband and wife, all known to the laws of all the States, and constituting sacred and inviolable rights, and legal and valuable rights—rights which the laws defend, and maintain, and redress. But these are relations of persons—all of them—over which the Government of the United States has no control; can exercise no authority; and which it can neither regulate, control, nor alter: for the plain reason that there is no grant for that purpose; no authority has been conferred, and no one has ever thought of exercising any such authority, or desires to do so, until the Constitution shall confer the power. I repeat it, no one has ever contemplated exercising or usurping this power. The alarm, therefore, affected, or real, of Southern gentlemen, is wholly gratuitous, and their denunciations and intimidations are altogether causeless and misplaced, and, being so, are wholly without effect. They might as well protest against being deprived of their sons and daughters, servants and wards, and even their wives, as of their slaves, by the General Government. I protest most solemnly that I do not believe that any constitutional latitudinarian, from any department of this empire, has ever imagined for one moment that this Government had the power to regulate, alter, or change the ordinary and existing relations of persons, in whatever shape they may subsist, in any of the States. For any thing this Government can do, the parent has an absolute and uncontrollable power over his son; the master over his servant, his apprentice; the guardian over his ward; and the owner over his slave. And what then? There is no express grant of power to this Government, the legitimate exercise of which may necessarily interrupt and destroy all these tender, endearing, and valuable relations. The grant of the power to make war, and provide for the common defence, necessarily places at the disposal of this Government the whole moral and physical force of the country; in the use and selection of which it must exercise its sound discretion and wisdom. The parent—the master himself—is not exempt from the operation of this power: his personal services, and the imminent exposure of his life may be required of him: and it would be the height of absurdity to allow him to claim an exemption for his son, his ward, his servant, or his slave, which he could not claim for himself. Can this position be controverted? If it can be, I have not heard the principles stated upon which it can be resisted. I feel that I am based upon a sure foundation, when I assume that it cannot. The contrary principle must take up the dangerous assumption, that local legislation, municipal and State law, may so modify and change the condition, rights, and obligations of personal relations, as to strip the arm of Government of its entire military power. You assign to this Government the defence of the Nation; and, by the assignment, create the duty—sacred, imperative, inviolable—and wrest from it the means of discharging that duty. This will not be contended for. And yet this extraordinary exemption is claimed for slaves. On what principle I cannot comprehend, unless it be upon the ground that a right which we are at a loss how to defend, is of all others the most inviolable and unassailable. Its weakness is its strength. Its being an indefensible wrong, renders it an unquestionable right. These paradoxes will scarcely be assumed as the basis of a theory to be reduced to practice. Why, then, should this description of persons not be used by the Government for the purposes of defence? "They are slaves, say gentlemen; and we will not be found fighting with them. War is too honorable an occupation to be followed by slaves. We should be degraded by being associated with them." But you were associated with them. You availed yourselves of their services, and were glad of their assistance. If they did not bear arms, they raised defences for you, and brought you subsistence and the munitions of war. They encountered peril and danger, and some met death in the service assigned them; and yet, even in such company, you won victory, honor, and glory, and were no more disgraced by being associated with a slave in the perils of battle, than by the aid and company of the war horse which bore you into it. This point of honor does not seem to sustain the objection. I am disposed to think that some gentlemen have perverted an objection from inexpediency into an objection from want of power. But these objections are by no means convertible. It may be inexpedient to employ slaves in the national defence. I grant that it would be so, except in cases like the one which gave rise to this claim. But this does not affect the right or power to employ them. It is inexpedient to subject boys of sixteen, or old men of eighty, to military service—but none would question the right of the Government to do so. All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient. So, I contend that it is merely upon the ground of expediency, and not the extent and nature of the right of the master, that slaves are not enrolled in the militia, and enlisted into the army of the United States. The right to enlist or impress them, is as perfect as the right to enlist or impress the master, or his son, or apprentice. It seems to me a perfect absurdity to claim an exemption for the slave that you would not think of asking for the master or his son. And yet I would be the last man in the country to advocate the employment of this species of force as a part of the military defence of the nation. They are unfit, because they are unsafe. Their civil and political condition renders them unfit moral agents to be entrusted with arms in any considerable numbers. Instead of being relied upon for defence, they must always be defended against. Instead of being esteemed friends and allies, war will ever place them in the attitude of enemies; although, in great emergencies, like that of the invasion of New Orleans, they may be employed lawfully, rightfully, and safely, too, if not for actual fighting, at least for transportation and the erection of fortifications, breast-works, and redoubts. But if the great body of the slave population could, like their masters, appreciate the benefits of their condition, and a sense of gratitude for favors conferred by elevating them from the wretchedness of their native barbarism to slavery, the privileges of involuntary, compulsory service, would always insure their obedience and faithfulness. I cannot comprehend upon what mysterious abstraction they can be excepted from the operations of the military power of the Government. To call them property, does not define the right, either in nature or extent, which you hold in them. They cannot be more absolutely yours than you are your own; and you do not claim to be exempt. The supposed virtues which I have imputed to them, would not render them less valuable to their owners, but would distinguish them as peculiarly adapted to the military service in the latitudes and climates where they mostly abound. The principle of self-government, too, devolves upon the People their own defence; and there can be no good reason for dispensing with the services of one-half of the population of any one district of the country. I come then to the conclusion, that there is nothing in the right of the master to his slave which can deprive the Government of his services; and it is only because the slave, from the very fact that he is so, is esteemed as a public enemy, that he cannot be trusted as an ally and a friend. I think, therefore, that this claim cannot be resisted upon the ground that the impressment of the slave was unauthorized, and that, therefore, the officer, and not the Government, is responsible for the act. The Government has incurred all the responsibility there is in the case, and is bound to pay whatever the master is entitled to from any one. This conclusion makes it necessary to enquire into the merits of the claim upon the Government. I begin my opposition to it, by showing that no such claim was ever made upon any Government on earth before. No Government ever paid for the life or limbs of its soldiers. Slavery has existed in all ages, and among all nations; and they have employed slaves in various capacities in the armies. They performed services there, and often times bore arms. The absolute right of the master to his slave, was as perfect then as it is now, and less controlled by law, and yet it was never heard that payment for the slave, as property, was ever made, or even thought of.

Slaves, or negroes who had been slaves, were enlisted as soldiers in the war of the Revolution; and I myself saw a battalion of them, as fine martial looking men as I ever saw, attached to the Northern Army in the last war, on its march from Plattsburgh to Sackett's Harbour.—Slaves seem to have been employed without scruple, in the defence of New-Orleans, and with perfect safety, too; and eight or ten years were suffered to elapse, before even these claims were thought of. And how came they now to be thought of? These facts show a progress of opinion on these subjects; an invention of new principles, partial and unjust in their application, and alarming and ruinous in their consequences: for it would not be difficult to show that the principles of this claim, allowed and established, would enable State and local legislation to place the whole military force of the country under the protection of State laws, and beyond the reach of the arm of the General Government. But this claim is actually res judicata. The principles of it have been repeatedly adjudged. The Claims Law of 1816 was enacted upon the exclusion of this claim. No provision was made for it; and though attempted, was expressly voted out, and by Southern votes too. The provision for compensation to deported slaves under the treaty of Ghent, a provision extended to no species of property lost, destroyed or captured by the enemy, for which this Government has ever held itself responsible to make compensation, virtually precludes the idea of the responsibility of this Government.

And what is there in the nature of this right in the person of a slave which is called property, which can distinguish it from the right involved in any other personal relation? It is a right of service: and that is all. This constitutes the whole value of the slave. It is all you can have of him; and this value is enhanced by the possession of those very qualities which fit him for the service of the Government. The services of the slave are valuable because they are the services of a rational being. It is his mind, his intellect, which gives him a value. Has not the master the same interest, the same in kind, if not in degree, in the services of his apprentice, or his hired servant? Has not the parent a legal right to the services of his child? And is not this a valuable right, and one which the law will protect and defend? And shall this right be deemed less sacred and inviolable than the master's interest in the slave? And yet the father must yield up his son—in some instances his only son, the stay and the prop of his old age, his dependence for subsistence, it may be, and certainly for comfort and happiness—must yield up this son, whose value to him cannot be estimated, to the claims of his country upon his valour and strength for her defence. He dies by disease in the camp, or is slain in battle, fighting the enemy. But no father ever claimed of you pay for his son, for his life, his blood, or his limbs. You could not remunerate him. You could not make up his loss. You could indeed give him an equivalent for his labor, his services, of which he has been deprived. So far as property was concerned, you could substitute the treasury of the country. But you have never done so. You have never been requested to do so. No nation has ever done so, or ever can. And had the subject of this claim been a son instead of a slave, a free servant instead of a slave, or the master himself, this claim would never have been heard of. But he was a slave; and the nature of the service, and the value of the service is changed, and greatly enhanced. Had the service been performed by the master or his son, or his free servant, the rate of compensation would have been less, the obligations and responsibilities of the Government much less. But the service was performed by a slave; the service is the same, no more; but the price, the cost, much greater, on the principles of the claim. In the case of the freeman, the father, master, son, or free servant, the Government does not ensure the life or the limbs; but it is a slave, and the Government is called on to warrant both. It is a principle of law, that, what a man does by another, he does by himself; and the claims and liabilities are the same in one case as the other. But in the case before the House, a requisition was made upon the master, for so much transportation. He sends his slaves; on the principles of law and justice, he performs the service himself, by his slaves: but, on what principles of law or justice is he entitled to a different rate of compensation than he would have been, had he actually performed the service himself? There are none. It is preposterous to suppose any. This is the true view of this subject; and in this view of it, the claim cannot be sustained for one moment. The claim of the Government is upon the master, for services to be performed. The right to make the claim and to enforce it is admitted. He performs the service in the manner, and by the means that suit him best. He sends his slaves. The Government calls upon him, and not upon his slaves. The master renders the service, and is entitled to the compensation; but certainly to no more, when he performs it by an agent, than when he performs it by himself. This appears to me as clear and satisfactory as that things equal to one and the same thing are equal to one other. The service of the slave is equal to the same service performed by the master, and no greater. This principle places the Government upon the footing of perfect equality, in its relations to every citizen. The claim upon the Government is thus re-assured by the service rendered, and not by the condition of the agent rendering it. This is the basis of equality and justice. It is the only basis upon which the Government can stand. The service is the same to the Government as though performed by the master—the same as performed by a freeman, father or son, master or apprentice. It is the service which forms the basis of the claim, and the condition of the agent cannot change it. Upon this principle it is, that the liability of the Government is no greater when it takes the apprentice, than when it demands the master, or when it takes the son, than when it takes the father. It is for the benefit received for which the Government pays, and nothing more. For nothing more should it pay—for nothing more can it pay. And so, when the service is performed by the slave, the master is entitled to the same compensation as though he had performed it himself, and no more. That the condition of the agent does not change the nature of the service, is sufficiently illustrated, by the case of the minor and the apprentice. The privileges or legal rights, or the value of interest in the parent or master, or the obligations, disabilities or qualifications, of the child or apprentice, do not affect the rights of the Government. The Government may, nevertheless, command the services of all or either, and the compensation would be the same in either case. So the condition of the slave does not change the rights of the Government, nor the claim of the master. The question is, not what are the disabilities, disqualifications, and privations of the slave, but what are the rights of the master, and what the rights of the Government? And here it will be perceived, at once, that the Northern parent, and the Southern master, are placed upon a footing of perfect equality. The analogy is perfect; the comparison holds most strictly. I challenge the most subtle discrimination to take a distinction. The parent has a legal, valuable interest in his son, and is entitled to his custody and to his services. The laws of all the States will protect this interest. The Southern slave-holder can claim no more. The analogy between the citizen, apprentice and child, and the Southern slave, which gave the gentleman from Massachusetts so much pain, has not been instituted, cannot be instituted, does not exist—and I am not called upon to make it. The analogy is not there; it is between the masters. The master makes the claim; and the question is, what are his rights, and not what the wrongs or disabilities of the slave. The master cannot urge the latter to enhance the value of the former.

And here, I think, lies the error into which honorable gentlemen have fallen, who advocate this claim. They have been in the habit of urging the entire want of all privileges in the slave, as a reason for preferring superior claims for the master, as well as extraordinary exemptions for both. The slave has no civil privileges, and therefore owes no political obligations. The master has engrossed them all, and therefore he owes no political obligations on the slave's account. But these conclusions are not warranted by the assumptions. The powers and rights of the Government correspond with its obligations, and the duties of the citizen are as extensive as his power. But the slave has rights—one, certainly, which is unalienable—his life is his own, and he may defend it even against his master's assaults. The Government is bound to protect that life, as well as the property of the master. The slave owes a corresponding obligation, as well as the master. The slave may, therefore, be called upon on his own account, as well as the master on account of his interest in the slave. The Government is not bound to inquire into the extent and variety of the rights and immunities of the moral and physical agents under its protection. Protection alone furnishes a sufficient claim on the services of the protected, for defending the country and the Government. On this principle, aliens and foreigners are liable to be called upon to defend the country in which they enjoy a temporary residence and protection for their persons and property. The principle applies, with equal strength and force, to the slave and the master; and it is not the nature and extent of the right of the master in his slave that exempts him from the public service, but the unfitness of the slave himself for the purposes of the Government.

But slaves are property, say honorable gentlemen who support this claim; and to establish this point they speak of the manner in which they treat them. They sell them and buy them; and in the next moment they tell you that this is so by municipal law, the law of the State; and the next moment protest, what every body admits, that this Government has no control over those laws, and can neither alter or abolish them. It seems to be idle to be always protesting against the exercise of a power never claimed. But, if slaves are bought and sold by State laws, State laws may prohibit their sale, and would they be any the less property? Certainly not. The right of the master to the possession and services of his slave would still be the same. This circumstance, therefore, does not constitute them property. But if they are property, they are so by State laws, and all right to personal service may be constituted property by those laws, and there is no power in this Government to prevent it. But I think I have already shown that these laws cannot diminish the power or rights of this Government. But if slaves are property by State laws, (and I presume there is no formal enactment of any State declaring them so,) they are also persons. God has created them persons, and they are declared to be so by the Constitution, as often as it has declared any thing about them—technical legal persons—in the legal sense of the term, as distinguished from property. Strictly, and legally speaking, therefore, I deny that slaves are property. The quality of property is not predicable of persons, even by the laws of the slave-holding States. Personal services are not, strictly speaking, property. It is a legal right truly, and a valuable interest, defended by law, and to be compensated for by property. But they are the means of acquiring things or property, rather than property itself. Can we call the right we possess in our own services our property? Certainly not. But they are as much property as any other personal services. But if personal services can by any construction of terms be distorted into property in one form, they are so in all the forms in which they can exist. This view of the subject does not in the least lessen the right or the value of the interest of the master in his slave, but merely goes to the legal definition of that right. The term property has been wrongfully applied to that right; and has probably given rise to this novel claim, and is the sole cause of this protracted discussion. I believe that it has not been contended, indeed it cannot be pretended, that the master possesses, or can possess, any other right in his slave than to his personal services. He can make no other use of him. He can neither eat his flesh nor drink his blood; for he cannot take his life without being guilty of murder. This view of the subject disposes of the argument derived from that clause of the amendments of the United States' Constitution which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation. The Constitution did not refer to slaves. It did not in that clause refer to persons of any description; they had already been provided for in the preceding part of the same amendment; and in every place where claims have been in any way referred to, they had always been designated as persons. But it was urged the other day, by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that this clause of the Constitution settled the question, and that the rejection of the claim would be a virtual interpolation of the amendment in the question, with this exception—"except slaves;" and asks, with great confidence, if it can be supposed that the Constitution would have been adopted with that clause. With all deference, I beg permission to say that I think there is a fallacy in the supposition put by the honorable gentleman; and it consists in not presenting the case under consideration—in putting the services of slaves for slaves themselves. The gentleman's supposition should have presented this exception—"except the personal services of such persons whose migration or importation any of the States, now existing, shall think proper to admit, which shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, who may be occasionally employed in great emergencies, in time of war, for the purpose of defending themselves and their masters from capture and destruction by the enemy, in such services as they may fitly and with safety to the public execute and perform—when, and in such case, their masters shall be paid the same rate of compensation as are awarded for similar services to minors and apprentices, or their parents or masters, and no other or greater.” Will the honorable gentleman suppose that such a clause would have formed any obstacle to the adoption of the Constitution? And yet this is the case presented by this claim, and this the interpretation which its rejection gives to the Constitution, and no other. But the honorable gentleman might have gone on with other suppositions, and have concluded with a similar question. I will put some for him. “One rate of compensation shall be awarded for services rendered by all freemen, minors, and apprentices, and a two fold rate for the same services when performed by slaves,” “Minors and apprentices, and all freemen, may be compelled to perform military service, to dig in the entrenchments, and erect fortifications and military defences: but slaves, on account of the inviolable and sacred nature of this kind of property in their masters, shall be wholly exempt from the performance of any such services; but if, by the operation of the eminent domain, and the law of necessity, any of them shall by possibility be forced into such service, and shall be killed, the master shall be paid the full value of such slave, in addition to the compensation for his services rendered, but no compensation shall be made for the life of a minor or apprentice destroyed in the performance of the same services.” Would such a constitution have been adopted? Would any such Constitution have been proposed at the time the Constitution was adopted?

It does appear to me, sir, that the argument from the Constitution is abundantly disposed of. The Constitution never thought of providing for this case.

One other remark of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, pronounced with some emphasis, struck me as somewhat extraordinary, and as deserving some comment, although I admit that I do not perceive its connexion with the merits of this claim. Speaking of the rights of masters to their slaves, and the obligations of justice to them, he put the question, if any State could undertake to manumit the slaves without making adequate compensation to their masters for their value? The gentleman is no doubt aware, that our sense of justice is somewhat a matter of fashion, and is liable to be influenced very much by custom and habit—and that what has been repeatedly done without shocking our moral sense, is in no great danger of violating our sense of justice; and, a priori, in no great danger of being considered unjust. Several States in this Union have successively manumitted their slaves, and it has escaped my observation and research, if, in any one instance, remuneration to the master has been provided by the State Government. Massachusetts, at a very early day, in 1780, if I mistake not, by one sweeping act, manumitted her slaves, absolutely and unconditionally, without awarding any compensation to their former masters. Other States followed in succession, in what order is not material and no compensation in any case was provided or paid. The number of slaves in Massachusetts amounted to about ten thousand. But I have never heard that the moral sense of the citizens of that Commonwealth was shocked by their manumission. The act was sanctioned by the judgment of the whole community. Even the owners themselves were silent under the convictions of the urgent justice of the law of emancipation. If any complaints existed, they were smothered in the bosoms of those who entertained them, or were confined within the limits of the domestic circle, and were not permitted to escape the walls of the household.

The process of emancipation commenced with Massachusetts, and, progressing through the Northern States in what succession I do not pretend to state, has continued its march as far south, I believe, as the Southern border of Pennsylvania. Slavery has existed to a greater or less extent in all the old thirteen States. Seven of them have abolished and annihilated that moral and political curse, but without acknowledging the obligation to provide any remuneration to slave holders for the consequences to them of this act of justice and obedience to nature and nature's God. It ought here to be observed, that it is not the amount or the quantity of the consequences of any particular act, that constitutes its injustice. It is the nature of the act, the violation of moral principle, and the outrage committed upon individual and private right. The principle is the same whether one citizen or all the citizens of a State hold slaves, or whether each claims the possession of a hundred, of fifty, of ten, or one of this species of property—persons, I should say, sir. The injustice of emancipation—if injustice is contained in it—is the same in degree, though different in extent; and the moral sense of the community should be as much shocked by violence to the rights, and an outrage upon the person or property of an individual, as of a million. Several years have passed, sir, since the State of New York commenced a series of enactments for the gradual abolition of slavery in that State. The results of those enactments were consummated on the Fourth of July last. Since when, and from thenceforth and forever slavery has not existed, and cannot exist, in that State. And so far were the Legislature of that State from making any provision for compensating by law the numerous individuals whom they thus deprived of their property—according to the principles of this claim—that they actually imposed upon them additional and extraordinary obligations. They required the owner to prepare his slave for the enjoyment of liberty, by a process incurring a very considerable expense, by imparting to him, so much literary instruction as at least to enable him to read the Bible, thereby imbuing him with the principles of our holy and blessed religion, at the same moment that they conferred upon him the appropriate and twin blessing of civil liberty. And this was done under no less a penalty than their forfeiture of their right in the slave at a much earlier day.

If slaves are property, then property, private property, was thus taken away, absolutely annihilated, by public authority, without, not adequate, but any compensation. But this great moral and political event—for it was a great and important event sir—was effected without doing violence to the moral feelings, or sense of justice, of any portion of the community of that great State. So far from this, sir, this event has been our boast, our pride; it has been commemorated and celebrated, and has been and is, esteemed almost as great an improvement in our moral and political condition, as any other great and contemporaneous work has been to the internal prosperity and resources of the State. And now, sir, does any one suppose that this great example of New York, would not be followed by Southern gentlemen themselves, by the States of Virginia and Maryland, for instance, if the measure could be esteemed safe; if the magnitude of the evil did not discourage them from grappling with the monster. If the slave population of the State of Virginia did not exceed what that of New York was, who doubts that they would forthwith emancipate them? Even Southern sensibility, I apprehend, would not revolt at the injustice thus perpetrated upon private right. It is not because it would be unjust to individuals, but unsafe to the community, to enact universal and absolute emancipation. And yet it is manifest that the extent and magnitude of the evil which would be thus abolished, the multiplicity of the slave-holders, and the multiplicity of their slaves, would not make this great political and civil change unjust in Virginia, which a more limited extent rendered just in New York.

Mr. SPEAKER, I have not entirely satisfied myself on one part of my argument, in the remarks which I have submitted to the House. I refer to that branch of it which touches upon the extent of the right of the master to his slave. I will take the liberty of repeating, sir, that that right is limited to the personal services of the slave; and when they are paid for, it is all the master can claim from the Government. It is all the master has been deprived of, and all the Government has received; and this, sir, settles the question, and ends the argument.

Mr. BRYAN, of North Carolina, rose and said: Coming as I do, from a State, much of the wealth of whose citizens consists of the kind of property, the nature and extent of which is now under the consideration of the House, I should feel myself negligent, if not culpable, were I to permit the question to be taken without endeavouring to vindicate and establish what I deem to be the rights of my constituents—rights which cannot be impugned without a violation of the rights of the States, and the sacred injunctions of our Federal Constitution.

From a very early period of the history of America, we find the rights of property recognized and used over these persons—nay, sir, from the earliest records, both sacred and profane, we find a state of slavery established and sanctioned. By the usages of ancient warfare, the vanquished in battle became the slaves of the victors, and their right of even putting them to death, was admitted, and too often practised. The institution of slavery may even be said to have mitigated the horrors of war, and by arraying the avarice of the conqueror against the appetite of revenge, to have often staid the fatal blow. We find, sir, in confirmation of this position, that, among the aborigines of this country, where the practice of enslaving their captives did not prevail, that they were very generally put to death, by the most cruel tortures. But, Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House with an idle display of research into ages that have long gone by, but will confine myself more strictly to the state of slavery, as existing among us.

Its origin may be imputed to the cupidity of the mother country, who, looking upon her colonies, more as the means of enriching herself, than of contributing to the happiness of mankind, introduced those persons into her colonies, as an article of traffic. It was urged as an argument in justification of the measure, that it was an act of humanity to these unfortunate beings, as they had been taken captive by more powerful tribes, in their own land, and that their conquerors would put them to death, unless they could be sold, and thus more advantageously disposed of. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this argument was well-founded in numerous instances. We learn from the authentic narratives of early travellers, that those native tribes of Africa were highly savage and ferocious, delighting in blood—they still are so—and I do not hesitate to avow, as my firm belief, that the negro slaves of the State I have the honor in part to represent, are much more happy—more blessed with intellectual and natural advantages—more amply furnished with all that makes this life happy—and more especially sir, (and this should go very far towards reconciling their real friends to their situation) infinitely better provided with the means of Christian instruction and education, than the descendants of their African progenitors who have remained in the land of their fathers. But, sir, be their situation what it may, our country, the United States, are innocent partakers with them, of the disadvantages of their condition.

It is matter, sir, of historical fact, that the Colonial legislatures passed acts to prevent the iniquitous traffic which brought them to our shores. During our Colonial dependence, these acts had not the force of laws till sanctioned by the King of England—that sanction was refused, inasmuch as it would deprive his subjects of a gainful traffic. Do we not know, sir, that Great Britain also actually insisted upon being permitted to supply the Spanish Colonies with slaves, and that this right was guaranteed to her by the solemnities of treaty stipulations? What was the conduct, on the other hand, of this country, as soon as she was emancipated from British dominion? Among our first acts, were those prohibiting the further introduction of slaves; and the Federal Constitution itself, that imperishable monument of human wisdom, contains an article empowering Congress to abolish this odious traffic. This power has been liberally exercised, and America has earnestly engaged in the noble contest of extirpating those wretches who can quaff with exultation the tears of human misery. Congress has declared all engaged in it to be pirates—the enemies of the human race; and condemned its perpetrators to an ignominious death. Britain, though, now stands forth the champion of freedom. There would be much more justice in her charity, as is more than insinuated by one of her most eminent jurists, [Lord Stowell,] if she bore the expense also of being charitable. It has always been, Mr. Speaker, an easy matter to raise a hue and cry about charities of various kinds, but there is a sad falling off in the number of the shouters when they have to pay for it.

Having thus briefly endeavoured to dispose of the general subject, and to wipe off from the American escutcheon the unjust stigma of originating or perpetuating this state of society, I shall advert to the case immediately before us.

The report of the Committee states, that the slave, horse, and cart, of this man [Marigny D'Auterive] were impressed by the Commander of the American forces, to aid in throwing up breastworks for the defence of New Orleans, and that the necessity was so urgent as to justify the act; that the slave lost an arm and an eye from the fire of the enemy, and whilst engaged in the service of the United States. They report a bill making compensation for the horse and cart, and the time of the slave; but it is contended that the master is not entitled to remuneration for the damage done to his slave—done in the manner and to the extent I have stated.

The General Government is invested by the Constitution with the power of making war—this is a high and mighty—a sovereign power. In its exercise they have a right to employ the intellectual and physical resources of the country, to the extent necessary for the defence and protection of the persons and property of the citizens; for this duty of the Government is the correlative of its right to the allegiance of its citizens, and is most emphatically the great object of all Governments. In the exercise of this power and duty, it has been the universal practice upon emergencies similar to that stated in the report, for the Government to exercise its right of eminent domain by impressing private property for public use, upon the admitted principle that a part may be sacrificed for the preservation of the whole, which is the same principle, sir, that justifies the throwing goods overboard from a ship, for the preservation of the lives of the crew. The Constitution of the United States sanctions this principle, if indeed it needed any sanction, by providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

But, say gentlemen opposed to this claim, slaves are not to be regarded altogether as other property—in this case the slave is to be regarded as a person—and the owner is no more entitled to be compensated for his injury, and consequential loss of service, than would a Northern master be for the loss of the service of his apprentice under similar circumstances. And the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. MARTINDALE] who has just taken his seat, has defied any Southern gentleman to point out a distinction between the two cases. Sir, to my mind, and I think to the mind of any reasonable man, the distinction is most obvious. The apprentice is a freeman—a citizen—he owes allegiance to the Government—is a member of the body politic, and as such, the Government is bound to protect him. These propositions are not true of the slave. The apprentice is simply bound, by contract, to serve his master; the law enables him, or others in his behalf, to enter into this contract of service; but he is still liable, in almost all the States, to do military duty before the age of twenty one years. The sovereign has a right to his services, on account of his being a citizen; and, as was well observed by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] the act of Congress renders him competent to make the contract of enlistment simply by removing the disability of infancy. But, Sir, a slave has far greater disabilities than those of infancy or apprenticeship—he labors under a total want of capacity to contract; and this Government cannot confer upon him that power, because that would be conferring upon him one of the most important social rights of freemen. The gentleman from New York has farther contended, that this slave was employed as a person in throwing up entrenchments, which was military duty—and so, Sir was the horse employed in transporting the earth, which was just as much military duty as throwing it up; and this, according to the argument of the honorable gentleman, would make the horse a military person, and perhaps capable of enlistment.

The honorable gentleman strongly contends that slaves are not property, because the owner cannot do as he pleases with them. He cannot, says he, take away their lives—the slave has a right, says he, to his life; and this is urged as a triumphant distinction between him and mere property, which is said to be the mere creature of the owner's will, to do as he pleases with it. Sir, this argument is really almost ludicrous, and better suited to a County Court than to this grave deliberative assembly. Let us pursue it, Sir, to some of its consequences. Does the gentleman need to be told, that, in England, and in some States of the American Union, excessive cruelty to animals, to horses for instance, is punishable by indictment at common law? I suppose, according to the honorable gentleman's doctrine, because the law there would restrain the owner from cutting his horse's throat in the street, out of sheer malignity, therefore, he could have no property in him. This is the legitimate deduction from his premises. Property, Sir, as has been said by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] is the creature of the law; whether of the natural or social law, is not material here to be ascertained—its enjoyment therefore may be modified by law. I will not do my constituents, Mr. Speaker, the injustice to argue, as an abstract question, whether slaves are property—powers far superior to mine in argument, would only shake the firm foundation upon which this right is based, by attempting to fortify it. I will only refer, Sir, as matter of history, to several eminent instances in which it has been clearly recognised by Federal authority. The other day, Sir, in looking over the secret Journal of Domestic Affairs, of the Continental Congress, I discovered a report, and resolutions accompanying it, which seem to me to be perfectly conclusive upon this question. The report was made on the 29th March, 1779. It will be recollected, Sir, that, during the war of the Revolution, the British enlisted slaves as troops—and that the period I have mentioned, was one of great gloom and despondency in the South; and then, if ever, as the enemy were enlisting the slaves of the Southern planter, the Continental Congress might have found strong arguments for combating him with the same species of force—especially, as, by refraining from doing so, the slaves were not only lost to the owner, but were added to the military force of the enemy. The proceedings of Congress on this occasion, display that combination of wisdom and prudence, for which that body was so justly renowned. The report states that the delegation of South Carolina, in Congress, had represented the distressed state of the country, the desertion of the negroes to the enemy, and that those who still remained, were exposed to their artifices and temptations; that, if they were embodied, this desertion might be prevented, and they might be rendered formidable to the enemy, &c. Whereupon, "Resolved, That it be recommended to the States of South Carolina and Georgia, if they shall think the same expedient, to take measures" for raising a force of this description. By another resolution, it was declared that "Congress will make provision for paying the proprietors of such negroes, &c. a full compensation for the property, &c."—Secret Journal, pages 107—8. I do not know, Sir, whether the recommendation of Congress was adopted. I presume not. It is not at all material to the purpose for which I have quoted the Journal, to ascertain that fact. The report and resolutions show conclusively the sense of the Continental Congress—that the slaves, even with the example of the enemy justifying, I might say enforcing it, were not to be employed without the consent of the local authorities—and if employed with that consent, that the owners were to receive full compensation for the property—thus evincing the caution and the justice of the Congress of that day, deciding, as I contend, Sir, the very principle of compensation now before the House. It is indeed a much stronger case than the one now under consideration; for it might be contended, with much more force, that the slaves would, in that case, have been employed as persons.

Pursuing these historical illustrations, Sir, we find in the British Treaty of 1783, which closed the war of independence, provision is made by the 7th article against "the destruction or carrying away of any negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants." In the secret debates of the convention of 1787, which framed the present Constitution of the United States, slaves were unequivocally admitted to be property, and objections were made, on that precise ground, to their being enumerated in the population of the Southern States, and estimated in the ratio of representation at three-fifths of their actual number; a distinguished member of the Convention from Massachusetts contending, that the cattle of New England might be represented with as much propriety. In the convention of Massachusetts which adopted the Constitution the same objection was also made. If we consult the history of the legislation of this Government, it will appear no less clearly that they are regarded as mere property; they are, as such, subjected to the direct tax; their assessment and valuation are provided for—and they are sold as property under the laws and the judicial proceedings of the United States. When a burden is to be borne by the property of the citizens, gentlemen are willing to consider them as property; when they are to be paid for, having been seized and injured in the public service, then it is most convenient to call them persons.

The honorable gentleman from New York is entitled to credit for having discovered "a new thing," when he contends that slaves are not property, because their owners are only entitled to their services; or, in his own language, that they are to be regarded as the "means of acquiring property, and not as property." I would be glad to know, Sir, in what consists the value of any kind of property, if it is not in being the means of acquiring property; that, Sir, is its great and most ordinary use. If this argument be true, a man is not entitled to his own ideas, because they are often used as the means of acquiring property; and intellect, the noblest and most peculiar kind of property, must no longer be regarded by its possessor as his own. As slaves have never been considered as military persons, so, Mr. Speaker, have they never been considered as civil persons, if I may use the phrase. I will ask any gentleman from a Southern State, if he has ever known them called out to assist the civil authority, as a part of the posse comitatus? Has a sheriff ever been known to summon his neighbor's slaves to assist him in the execution of process? Can he go upon a plantation where the owner's negroes are at work, and command them to attend and aid him in the execution of his official duty? No, Sir, this is too monstrous to be thought of; and yet the argument of the honorable gentleman, if followed, leads inevitably to this conclusion. I am happy, Sir, to be able to say, that the honorable gentleman from New York is the only member of this House who has contended that slaves are not property. I do not believe that he can find a second on this floor; and I, with cheerfulness, add my testimony to that of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. M'DUFFRE] and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER] in favor of the just and liberal views of our Northern brethren. Their sentiments, as frankly avowed in this debate, must have a powerful tendency to repress any improper emotions in the bosoms of those who are afflicted with this kind of property, and to quell any spirit of insubordination in the slaves themselves.

When this debate originated, Mr. Speaker, I confess I felt much regret, believing that it would create much unnecessary excitement and waste of time. I have endeavored to discuss the question, Sir, with calmness. I am, Sir, no advocate for slavery in the abstract. I agree entirely with my honorable friend from South Carolina, [Mr. DRAYTON]; that it is great evil; and I believe, too, Sir, that the owner is rather more to be pitied than the slave. I must do my constituents the justice, and it is mere justice, to say that their slaves are treated with a degree of mildness, and attention to their wants, much more indicative of good and generous feeling than that of a desire to make the most of their property. The slave, Sir, is generally happier than the master; while his owner is "spinning his brains" for the support of his family, or torturing his ingenuity, and tossing his aching head upon his pillow to provide "ways and means" for the payment of his debts, or performance of his contracts, the slave, released from all these cares, well fed, well clothed, and performing moderate labor, enjoys the tranquility of mind, and health of body, which form very important items in the sum of human happiness.

If the Southern States are to be purified from this moral pestilence, it will not, it cannot be by fulminating edicts, or mawkish harangues, against their right of property. Passion and enthusiasm have rarely given good counsel. There are many intelligent and patriotic citizens of the South, who would be willing to adopt a system for the cure of this malady, provided wholesome medicine, suited to the Constitution, be used. The consent of the owner, and the emigration of the freed-man, should be, and must be, indispensable in any system. Sir, several of my constituents have shown the most earnest and sincere zeal in promoting the objects of the Colonization Society; and, sir, how have they shown it? Not by clamor and intemperance; but by good deeds—by being charitable at their own costs. They have emancipated their slaves, and provided the means of transporting them out of the Union. This is what may be called an actuating faith. I have been anticipated, Mr. Speaker, in several arguments which had occurred to me, and which I should have offered, had I been more fortunate in my efforts to obtain the floor. They have been presented, sir, by honorable gentlemen, much more forcibly and eloquently than my lips could have uttered them. I know too well, I trust, sir, how much is due from me to the courtesy of the House, to weary it with an elaborate argument upon a subject which has already been so much canvassed. I had declined troubling the House with any remarks of mine upon this question, but was called up by the novel and extraordinary doctrines of the gentleman from New York, which, as a faithful representative of my constituents, I could not permit to pass without protest, and an attempt to refute them. As to the other question which has been raised in this case, whether the damage done to the slave was direct or consequential, I really do consider that to be a mere law quibble, and am reminded by it, sir, of the learned and astute Shibboleth so gravely uttered in Courts—'yclep'd Courts of Justice—when they are engaged in ascertaining, not whether a suitor has suffered injustice from his neighbor, but whether he should have brought an action of trespass or case. I rejoice, sir, that here, at least, we can do substantial justice. D'Auterville's property has been forcibly taken for public use—it has been injured in the public service. Reason, Justice, and the Constitution, unite in saying, "that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." They all say, pay him what is just—and so I hope we shall say. I feel no difficulty about my vote, sir. I have arrived at my conclusion without passion, and I shall adhere to it with quite as much firmness and inflexibility as if I had invoked the furies of discord and disunion, or endeavored to array before this House the distorted spectres of fancy.

I am admonished, Mr. Speaker, by the lateness of the hour, that I have sufficiently imposed upon the patience of the House. I conclude, sir, by expressing my lively gratitude for the attention which the House has been pleased to bestow upon my remarks, (undeserving as they have been.)

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1828.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CHILTON, yesterday, which were under consideration when the House passed to the orders of the day.

Mr. BARNEY desired not to be considered as wanting in courtesy to the honorable member from Kentucky, when rising in opposition to the reference of the resolutions to the Committee of Ways and Means, inasmuch as the Chairman of that Committee had expressed his unwillingness that they should be thus referred, and their merits could be tested by the discussion which would be thus elicited.

He was unwilling that the House should, by its deliberate vote, sanction a belief that the purity of our Republican Institutions were contaminated by prodigal and wasteful expenditures of the public money, calling loudly for reform in the Administration of our Government; and he would here disclaim all intention of provoking unnecessary discussion, by introducing the term administration in a political sense, his impressions having uniformly been that that administration was best, which was best administered. If we sanction this reference, it cannot fail to confirm an impression attempted to be made by a lascivious poet, who passed a few weeks in making a rapid tour through our country, and remaining three or four days in the Capital—certainly not as long as the honorable member from Kentucky has been in his seat—on his return to his native land thus describes us—

"Even now, in dawn of life, her early breath
Burns with the taint of Empires near their death;
And, like the Nymphs of her own withering clime,
She is old in youth, she is blasted in her prime."

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

This, sir, was the language of poetry and of fiction, and the libeller received the price of his slanders; but when we adopt those resolutions, we become the assailants of the fair fame of our country, and our act confirms the charges as matter of fact and of history. The printing for this House is the first item in the list of extravagancies. I grant you, sir, that it does involve a large expenditure; but how is it to be corrected? How regulated? Shall a purveyor of public printing be employed, especially charged with the duty of designating what shall and what shall not be consigned to the press? The task would be as invidious as it would become irksome and arduous, and could not fail to result in disappointment and dissatisfaction. Sir, I hesitate not to say that every printed document submitted to this House, voluminous as they are, are interesting to, and read by, some of its members, and many of their constituents. They are indispensable to a general and correct knowledge of each particular case. In the British Parliament, where no compensation is allowed, the most liberal policy prevails in diffusing information, for I have seen among their items of expenditures £120,000 sterling, or half a million of dollars, charged in one session for printing and stationery—an account much larger than the whole appropriation for our extravagant per diem of eight dollars per day, contingent expenses of printing, &c. included. The Treasury estimates for the present year amount to about nine millions of dollars; and on reference to them, it will be seen that the favorite maxim, in peace prepare for war, has received most respectful consideration. Fortifications, ordnance, armories, dry docks, timber for the future use of the Navy, equipping and organizing the militia, amount to near four millions, leaving something more than one million sterling, the amount appropriated for supporting the royal dignity of the King of England, to sustain our Government, its Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary Department, Army and Navy; and yet we are to convict ourselves of extravagance and prodigality.

The Fifth Auditor was alluded to as having been created for a special object, and under particular circumstances, which do not now exist; consequently, his services may be dispensed with. I find that, by the act of 1817, an additional Comptroller, and four additional Auditors were created by "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," and the necessity still exists for its continuance. It is contended that the salaries should be reduced. Whenever Congress is satisfied that more is allowed than is sufficient for a mere subsistence, then such a proposition may find favor. If the Government desire the services of faithful and intelligent men, they can only obtain them by allowing such compensation as will enable them to live free from the apprehension that the wants of to-morrow may be unprovided for. While gripping penury stares them in the face, and a helpless family are destitute of the ordinary comforts of life, the energies of neither mind nor body can be devoted to the public weal. A cursory glance at the operations of the Sinking Fund, will satisfy the gentleman that the public debt is amply provided for. Probably, before he retires from public life, and certainly before the expiration of another Presidential term, it will not exist even in name.

Thirty or forty officers are supposed to be at this time unemployed at the Military Academy at West Point. The bill from the Military Committee, now on our tables, authorizing the appointment of additional professors, does not sanction this idea. Having recently enjoyed an opportunity of becoming intimately acquainted with this invaluable institution in all its details, I can safely affirm that there are neither supernumeraries nor idlers connected with it. Presenting a most interesting spectacle of strict order, and high state of discipline; every duty, whether of the soldier or the student, is performed at its appointed time, without the least confusion, and every hour, from reveille to tattoo has its appropriate employments. No American can view such a scene without strong emotions of pride and gratification—he beholds the germ of future greatness to his country; for those whose capacity and diligence enable them to attain the proud eminence to which they all aspire—present themselves to the world the adopted children of their country, qualified to be useful in any situation in life, either civil or military. The impartial and equal administration of justice is one of the brightest attributes in its Republican character; for, while the son of a Sergeant has received its highest honors, the descendants of Governors, Members of Congress, and other prominent men, are sent home with a diploma of incapacity.

A portion of our revenues are credited to the sale of Public Lands, and an apprehension expressed that, when they are exhausted, there will be a difficulty in replenishing the Treasury. It is a mere figment of fancy to imagine that one dollar has ever been derived from the Public Lands. It would be considered rash to predict that nothing ever will be. While, Mr. Speaker, the present enlightened and liberal policy shall prevail, of ameliorating the condition of the Indians by annuities, donations, removals to a greater distance from our settlements, we shall continue to be the mere tenants in possession for the benefit of the original proprietors, the aborigines of our country, and the whole proceeds appropriated for their benefit.

If, in fifty years, which have elapsed since the Declaration of Independence, we have been enabled to dispose of but nineteen millions of acres, we have a fund left to draw upon for the next five hundred years, at all events. But, in addition to these, add fifty-five millions acres of unceded lands within the present limits of the States and Territories, and seven hundred and fifty millions North and West of the States and Territories, but within the limits of the United States; and, regarding the provisions of the Constitution, which forbid any other than the Government becoming the original purchasers, then our resources look into futurity two thousand years; probably as long as this Republic shall endure. No; God forbid. May it, as was piously exclaimed by the soldiers of the Revolution, live forever.

And now, sir, last, not least, I come to our noble selves. Our compensation, surely not greater than our deserts, must be reduced. I can approach this subject with a clear conscience, and hold up at the bar of this House a pure and spotless right hand, when declaring, that, during many years a public servant, not one dollar of the People's money has enriched my private coffers. The average pay of a member of Congress is about $1,100 a year, out of which must be defrayed all expenses here and elsewhere. In the Western and Southern States, the People require to know personally the candidate who asks their confidence; hence it becomes his duty to make a tour through his District; and, for at least three months previous to an election, he is employed in riding his circuit cultivating their good will; it is to me a source of pleasure and recreation: so industriously have I pursued it, that there are but few persons to whom I am unknown; and I verily believe that a good old horse, who has accompanied me in two campaigns, would, if a saddle bag was fixed on his back, and the whip occasionally applied, present himself in regular succession, at every farmer's door in Baltimore County. In a large double district, the cost of about 100,000 tickets forms a considerable item of expense; for which it is indispensable that seven or eight thousand votes should find their way into the ballot boxes to secure a seat here: a large allowance must be made for wear and tear, for many are literally torn up. The benign spirit of universal religious toleration prevails throughout this happy land, and numerous temples of worship to the Great Supreme, rearing their modest heads, even in the wilderness, proclaim the increase of piety and religion. To these, contributions are liberally made; for charity, like mercy, covereth a multitude of sins, and the Lord loves a cheerful giver. Thus, the People's money is returned to the People; and as pecuniary emolument never entered into my consideration when seeking the honor of a seat in this House, I have not desired to enrich myself by compensation. And there are many members, living more remote than myself, whose happiness is intimately connected with their domestic circle, who are induced not to assent to a separation from their families, and expend here thousands more than they receive. Once convinced that the exigencies of the nation do require that our per diem be reduced, and I pledge myself to go farther than is proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky—I will vote for a bill which shall deprive us of all compensation, from this day to the expiration of my term; but will never give my assent to a resolution pronouncing sentence of condemnation, until proof shall be adduced that prodigality and extravagance have existence in our Republic.

Retrenchment.

Mr. KREMER said, that it had been with pride and pleasure that he heard this resolution when it was first offered. He had rejoiced that at length a member had risen in his place, and, from a sense of duty, had presented such a resolution. He had himself, for three years past, urged it upon those who were better qualified than himself for the task, to bring forward such a proposition. It was with no small surprise, he said, that he heard this proposition now assailed. What was the question? The whole amount of it might be contained in the compass of a nut-shell. The Committee of Ways and Means are, by this resolution, called to inquire whether a retrenchment may not be made in the expenditures of this Government, without detriment to the public good. If they inquire and report to the House that no retrenchment can be made, be it so. But the impression has gone abroad, that we old fashioned Republicans are getting corrupt, and are extravagant. I want to know whether any evil can result from ordering such an inquiry as this. Who are we? We are but men; and the most exalted of our species are stamped with imperfection and frailty. It is well known that unlawful longings too frequently mark the character of men in power. Does any one doubt that the public expenses may be too great, when they look at the march of private extravagance? When they consider the evils that are exhibited in these ten miles square. I feel regret that such an example should be set at the seat of Government. If it were confined to the ten miles square, he should not so much regret it, but the force of example, in this Representative Republic, was most pernicious. Members of this House witness continually the extravagance which is engendered here—they insensibly imbibe it, and carry it home to their own neighborhoods. A Republican Government may be safe, so long as its main stream is kept in purity. But when the main stream is corrupted, all the tributary streams partake of its pollution till at length it spreads like an incubus over the whole land. We are told that the salaries of our public officers are not too high. I wish to see them reduced, and I want that the officers themselves should be obliged to attend to their duty within their offices. I don't want to furnish them with cash to travel through the land and make dinner speeches. I would give them what is fair and reasonable, but would encourage no extravagance. I, for one, trust that the resolution will at least go to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that we shall have the report of that Committee as to what officers can have their salaries curtailed; and then, I trust that there will be virtue and firmness enough in the House to reduce the salaries of all to what it ought to be.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he could not concur in opinion with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNETT] that no necessity for reform existed at the present time. On the contrary, I believe it is necessary that all the public expenditures should be subjected to a most rigid examination. That abuses do exist, which ought to be remedied, I do not entertain a particle of doubt. While this is my deliberate conviction, I entirely concur with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] that this is not the proper period for reform. Our duty at present, is to transact the necessary public business of the country, and to go home as soon as we can. I will say, however, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] that whoever shall undertake the work of reform, cannot accomplish his purpose by such a resolution as that now before the House. He must go to work systematically. He must patiently and laboriously ferret out one abuse after the other, himself, instead of imposing that labor upon others. Such a task cannot be performed by referring a general—an unlimited and undefined resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means, at this period, when, I trust, half the session has elapsed.

I should not have risen, upon the present occasion, to say one word, did I not believe that the duty which I owe to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury imperiously demands of me to make an explanation of the duties which that officer performs. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] never could have investigated the subject, when he informed the House, that office had been created for purposes which no longer exist. This office was created in March, 1817. Its duties originally consisted in auditing and settling all the accounts connected with the Department of State. These duties embraced all the accounts relating to our intercourse with foreign nations. Since this office was created, those duties must have been doubled. The independence of South America has since given birth to a new swarm of Foreign Ministers, Diplomatic Agents, and Consuls along the shores both of the Southern Atlantic and Pacific ocean. Their accounts must all be audited by this officer.

The same observation is applicable to the accounts of the Post Office Department. This officer is the Auditor of all the accounts of all the Post Masters, and all the Mail Contractors, in the United States. The new energy infused into this Department, by the excellent officer now at its head, has greatly extended the duties of the Fifth Auditor. This, however, is far from being the aggregate of his services. He has been made a kind of residuary legatee, of all the duties which other officers of the Government could not conveniently perform. When the office of Commissioner of the Revenue was abolished, in 1819, the Fifth Auditor was designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to perform the duties of that office. Although, since that time, there have been no internal taxes to collect, yet those gentlemen who know how difficult it is to wind up an old concern, will readily believe that the duties imposed upon this officer have been nearly as arduous as they would have been, had internal taxation continued. This branch of his business has entailed upon him an extensive correspondence with all the Collectors in the United States, who have not finally closed their accounts—and the number of such, even at this day, is not small. But the most extraordinary of all the duties which has been imposed upon this officer, is that which the President of the United States devolved upon him in 1821. Although never bred to the laws, yet he was appointed to discharge duties which strictly and properly belong to the office of Attorney General of the United States. Ever since that time, he has directed and superintended all the law suits, throughout the Union, in which the Government have been concerned; and, at the present moment, the United States have upwards three thousand law suits depending.

To show the extent and the arduous nature of this duty, I would remark, that the then Secretary of the Treasury, who was never suspected of a want of proper economy—an officer upon the purity and wisdom of whose official conduct the People of this country have passed, and who is now revered in his retirement by every patriot, recommended that a person should be appointed for the sole purpose of attending to these suits, with a salary of $2,500 per annum.

If, therefore, there be any one officer in this Government, whom the gentleman from Kentucky ought not to have designated as useless, that officer is the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury. I am just now reminded by gentlemen around me, that this officer, in addition to other burdens imposed upon him, has the charge of all the light houses in the United States.

I have a word to say to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNEY] before I take my seat. I am prepared at this time, and at all times, to act upon the subject of reducing our own pay. In relation to this question, I formed a deliberate opinion six years ago, which my experience ever since has served to strengthen and confirm, that the per diem allowance of members of Congress ought to be reduced. As a compensation for our loss of time, it is at present wholly inadequate. There is no gentleman fit to be in Congress, who pursues any active business at home, who does not sustain a clear loss by his attendance here. If we consider our pay, with reference to our necessary individual expenses, it is too much. It is more than sufficient to cover our expenses. I believe that the best interests of the country require that it should be reduced to a sum no more than sufficient to enable us to live comfortably whilst we are here. For my own part, I do not, like the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNEY] give away to my constituents my per diem allowance. I receive it, and use it for my own benefit. It seems that gentleman uses the surplus of his pay, in displaying his liberality to his constituents; by making donations to churches and charitable institutions at the public expense. In this manner he may use it most effectually for his own advantage; but still I am inclined to believe, his constituents, as well as mine, would be quite as well satisfied, if the surplus were allowed to remain in the Treasury, for the benefit of the Nation. If the Government of this country should ever want to employ almoners to distribute their bounty, the last men whom the People should desire to employ in this office, would be members of Congress. It might be dangerous to trust them with the performance of such a duty.

Upon the whole I scarcely know how to vote upon the present question. If the Chairman, or any gentleman upon the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom this resolution is directed, will say there is any prospect that it may be productive of good, during the present session, I shall vote in the affirmative. If not, I shall vote in the negative. When we commence the work of reform, I wish to enter upon it seriously. I wish the House to be prepared to act with wisdom and with energy, in cutting off the useless branches of public expenditure. Until that time shall arrive, I do not wish to encourage hopes which cannot be realized.

Mr. M'DUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, said, that with regard to the propriety of retrenchment, as a member of that Committee, he felt wholly incompetent to express any definite opinion, but he would suggest to the mover of the resolution that, if he desired to effect any really beneficial object in relation to this matter, the proper course would be to introduce a series of resolutions applying systematically to the various retrenchments he wished to effect, and have them referred to the appropriate Committees. The Committee of Ways and Means were already incumbered with business, and it would be out of the question for them to do any thing like justice to such an inquiry, which, indeed, he did not consider as appropriate to that Committee. Should the resolution pass in its present form, it would send the Committee of Ways and Means on a voyage of discovery, without chart or compass. It was out of the question to expect that that Committee are to go severally to the different Departments, and there make minute investigations as to the duties and salaries of all the officers of the Government.

He would suggest to the honorable gentleman to subdivide his resolution, and would for the present, move to lay it upon the table; but was willing to withdraw the motion, if that gentleman wished to say any thing farther in explanation or defence of it.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, requested Mr. McDUFFIE to withdraw the motion; but he said he could not do so, unless at the request of the mover.

Mr. CHILTON (the mover) having made with success, a similar request, was proceeding to explain the object of the resolution, when

The SPEAKER announced that the hour allotted to resolutions had now expired.

Mr. BARNEY moved to postpone the orders of the day, for the purpose of proceeding with the present discussion; but the motion was negatived.

GEORGIA AND FLORIDA BOUNDARY LINE.

The following message was received from the President of the United States; which was read.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

WASHINGTON, 22d JAN. 1828.

By the report of the Secretary of War, and the documents from that Department, exhibited to Congress at the commencement of their present session, they were advised of the measures taken for carrying into execution the act of 4th May, 1826, to authorize the President of the United States to run and mark a line dividing the Territory of Florida from the State of Georgia; and of their unsuccessful result. I now transmit to Congress copies of communications received from the Governor of Georgia, relating to that subject.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. HAYNES, of Geo. moved to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said that the question submitted to Congress in the message of the President just referred to, was one of great importance to the United States, and of still greater to the Territory of Florida. It involved a question of boundary which they supposed had been settled long since, and never expected to see revived again. Since it was introduced here, however, it must be disposed of, and under the rules of the House it was difficult to say what committee had, appropriately, the cognizance of it. The Committee on the Judiciary, in the learning, ability, and integrity of which he had the utmost confidence, were charged with the consideration of all questions involving judicial proceedings. It was obvious, said Mr. W. that there was no question of that nature involved in this matter. The questions to be investigated had arisen under three treaties, that of 1783—of 1795, between Spain and the United States, and that of the 22d of February, 1819; and although there was now no question immediately in reference to our foreign relations, it nevertheless referred itself to the negotiations and relations of this Government, at the respective periods of the ratifications of these treaties, and the rights of each party growing out of them, naturally involved such inquiries as were generally made by the Committee of Foreign Affairs. That Committee have less business before them, and are entirely competent to present an enlightened and satisfactory view of the subject. He should not, however, move a reference to either of the Standing Committees, for two reasons: First, because it did not legitimately, by the rules of the House, belong to either, and, secondly, because they were so much occupied by subjects previously referred to them, that it would be impossible to obtain a report as early as it was desirable. He preferred that it should go to a select committee, and he thought that the magnitude of the object justified such a disposition of it. The claim of Georgia, now set up in the communications of the Executive of that State, and transmitted by the President, embraces a tract of country South of Ellicot's line including fifteen hundred thousand acres, claimed by the United States, as a part of the territory acquired by the treaty of 1819 with Spain: about eight hundred square miles of which has been surveyed and sold by the United States, and the money deposited in the public Treasury. The amount of property, the subject of jurisdiction, the uncertainty of titles, and the suspension of the sales, all unite to render it desirable that the question should be speedily settled. The bill which passed at the last Session was referred to the Committee of Public Lands. Mr. W. expressed his satisfaction that, in moving for a Select Committee, he was not animated by any desire to obtain any garbled or one-sided view of it. It was known he could not, and, if he could, would not, sit upon it. If it was the pleasure of the House to send it to the Judiciary Committee, he did not doubt but that the rights of Florida and the United States would be ably, faithfully, and impartially investigated, and to whatever Committee referred, he should be satisfied.

Mr. WILDE said, he should always trouble the House with great reluctance, and his reluctance was increased, in consequence of being obliged to differ from the gentleman from Florida, in relation to the propriety of the proposed reference. Such subjects, he believed, had usually been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A question or similar character took that course during the last session. He was sure the gentleman from Florida desired only what he himself and the People of the State of Georgia also desired, that this question should be fully, patiently, and impartially examined, and justly decided. Their feelings were all in favor of the prosperity of Florida; their interests led them to wish her early admission into the Union at the earliest period. In any event, the titles acquired by individuals from either Government, within the disputed territory, would, he presumed, be respected, and jurisdiction alone, though a relinquishment of it was forbidden by State pride, of which he had as much as any one else, would not be insisted on, if not shewn to be the right of Georgia. She took more pride, he trusted, in her justice, than in her jurisdiction.

With regard to the proposed reference to the Committee of Foreign Relations, he would observe, that, in all questions of this description, it is not only important that justice should be done, but that those who are interested should believe it has been done. In that view of the subject, he felt bound to oppose a reference to that Committee. A report from that quarter, upon another matter, did not satisfy the People of Georgia, nor increase their disposition to submit any question connected with their interest to that Committee.

He did not propose now to inquire how far their distrust was well or ill founded—it was enough for his purpose that it existed. As to a reference to a Select Committee, he considered objectionable such a motion, when the conflict was between a State and the Union, it was suspicious. It was like a motion for a special jury, in a cause where the Crown was concerned. He had the most entire confidence that no advantage in the selection of a Committee was sought by the gentleman from Florida. He was sure none would, in any event, be obtained, as none was desired on either side. The subject came, he considered, within the proper duties of the Judiciary Committee. Their zeal, ability, industry, and impartiality, commanded entire confidence, and neither required nor admitted of eulogium from him. Why, then, should this inquiry be withdrawn from them?

Mr. W. concluded by expressing his hope that the motion of his colleague [Mr. HAYNES] would prevail.

Mr. WHITE said, he was not unwilling the matter should go to the Judiciary Committee, but three days since that Committee had at their own request, been discharged from the consideration of a question involving the boundary between Michigan and Illinois. Mr. W. had considered the question as virtually settled last year when it had gone to the Committee on the Public Lands. He could not be suspected of wishing to be placed at the head of the Select Committee, because, as a Delegate from a Territory, he was precluded from sitting on any Committee.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR (Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary) made some statements in reference to the business before that Committee being already sufficiently onerous; when

Mr. GILBERT advocated at some length the reference of the message to that Committee. There was no necessity for any hurry in the case, and it might turn out that the ultimate question would go at all events to that Committee. He deprecated any but the usual course in this affair—denied that the subject had any relation to our correspondence with Foreign Nations, and insisted on the propriety of avoiding every thing that might excite suspicion of any partiality in the course which should be taken on this memorial. It was very well known, he said, that much excitement had grown out of the relations between the United States and the State of Georgia for several years past. This very circumstance made it the more important that any business in which the State of Georgia was interested should take the usual course in this House. He was opposed to any reference but to a Standing Committee, and to any partial operation which might be produced upon the decision of the subject by its reference to a Select Committee.

Mr. HAYNES remarked that, although the question embraced by this controversy did arise, as stated, out of the Treaty between the United States and Spain, yet the United States now occupy, as to Georgia, the position, in reference to this question, which Spain formerly did: and there was, therefore, no sort of propriety in giving the subject, as now presented, a direction to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

The question was then taken on referring the message to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. OF R.]

CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive.

Mr. BURGESS said that in ordinary cases of private claims, to hear patiently, and to decide justly, comprehended the whole duty of a member of this House; for the report of the committee, with the explanations of the gentleman who made it, and the discussions of those representatives whose constituents may be immediately interested in the claim, furnished all the facts and principles necessary for a correct decision. Under this impression, it was my intention, said Mr. B., to have been silent in this debate; nor should I have departed from that intention, had not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GURLEY] introduced into the question a new set of facts, and new and extraordinary principles. If the amount only of the claim be regarded, it is, indeed small and inconsiderable; but if we look at the principles on which this claim is made, they will furnish abundant apology for any gentleman choosing to impugn them by a critical examination of their nature and tendency. Parts of this discussion have furnished instances of constitutional construction too dangerous to the rights and liberties of the People of this country to be heard in this hall, and passed over in silence by any man nursed in the freedom and schooled in the principles of the Revolution. It is said, too, that our debates here have created excitement in the Southern parts of the Union. They have learned with astonishment that men on this floor, debating this amendment, have questioned and denied the legality of their claim to such persons as are by the laws of those States held to service or labor. These excitements must have been produced by merely vain imaginings; and utter misapprehensions; for all who hear me will bear testimony to the fact, that no such opinion has been uttered in this hall. The question itself, as it is now brought into this debate, has assumed a serious aspect, and merits a serious discussion. It is not now a demand for services performed, or for goods delivered: it is for deterioration of a slave, produced by an accident, which happened to him while doing ordinary labor at the shovel or spade, for the United States. No freeman ever received a compensation, or made a claim for any such injury. This is the first of a numerous class of claims of a similar character; and all of which will be pressed forward or withdrawn, just as this shall succeed in this House.

Sir, before any further consideration of this question, permit me to solicit your attention to some examination of some of the things which have been pressed into this debate, and associated with it. Every person who hears what I say now, and every person who may hear what I have said in this debate, and who has any interest in the kind of property connected with this claim, is, by the Constitution of the United States, and by the laws of the several States where he resides, entitled to be fully quieted in the possession of that interest. No gentleman who has spoken here, has questioned their rights, or intimated a wish to disturb their possession, or call into discussion their title. No man here has claimed, for the Congress of the United States, the constitutional right to legislate concerning the nature, the acquisition, the tenure, transfer, or evidence, of any kind of property, in any one of the several States. I pray of you, sir, to let me be at pains, and task the patience of this House, while I endeavor to show the utter absurdity of any attempt at any such kind of legislation. All property in any one of these United States, is comprehended in either things real or things personal. Things real are those legal relations existing between lands and the owners of them. The fee simple is the highest order of this relation. Different, complex, and conditional relations of this class, require no description. Other relations are freehold, and less than freehold, for a greater or less number of years. To these may be added estates in possession or in expectancy, and as well those owned by a single as a greater number of tenants. The tenure by which several relations to lands are holden, the title by which they may be claimed, and the manner in which title shall be proved, are each large departments of jurisprudence, and have exercised the best skill and most profound wisdom of legislation in other countries, and in each of these United States. Property in things personal, is that estate which, in this country, we may have in any thing other than land. It is either in possession or in action. You either have it in your own hands, or in the hands of those to whom you have entrusted it. Your goods, wares, and merchandise; your flocks, herds, and the fruits of your lands; the instruments of your agricultural, mechanic, manufacturing, or commercial industry—in short, the avails of your land, the results of your capital, the proceeds of your labor, are one great portion of individual wealth, called property in things personal. Another great portion of it consists in the infinite variety of claims which men have on other men, for money, goods, or labor, either by force of contracts, or by enactments or adjudications of law. Among these are notes, bills, bonds, records, together with the infinite variety of legal implications, by which labor, goods, or money, are due from one man to another. To these should be added the labor and service due by any one person to any other person, either by contract or for a limited time, or by law, and for time unlimited.

Now, sir, which class of all these various descriptions of property, in either things real or things personal, falls within the legislative jurisdiction of this Congress? Concerning which one class of them all, or what article in any one of them, can we enact any law, in any degree or respect altering its nature, or tenure, or title; the manner of acquiring or transferring, or the evidence whereby it shall be secured in possession of one person, or reclaimed and recovered, when in the possession of another? Where are our statutes concerning tenures, and title deeds, descents, and devises, and distributions? Where those of contracts, either parol or in writing, whether simple or sealed? Where, in fine, are those codes of laws, under which persons are bound to labor or service, in any one of the several States of this Union? All these laws are found, and sufficiently numerous, for all the exigencies of property or persons, in each of all these States, either in the pure civil, common, or canon law—or as the same may, for greater convenience, have been, from time to time, altered by any of the respective legislatures of these States. In the statute, and other books of legal learning of these States, and not in the statute books of the United States, are such laws to be found. Truly, sir, why should they be found in the statute books of the United States, when it is clear as the light that all these matters and things are of the several States, and not of the United States' legislative jurisdiction?

What gentleman, sir, on this floor, has claimed for the Congress of the United States the right to enact any such laws? Not one. All must disclaim all such right. For good reason, too, because the Constitution has given us no such right. Except concerning the exclusive jurisdiction of ceded territory, the legislative power of Congress seems confined to raising and disbursing revenue, for common defence, and general welfare; together with the legislation incidental and auxiliary to those great objects. Who, then, sir, will contend—who has contended—that Congress can make any law altering, or impugning, or invalidating, those laws of any of the States creating that legal relation called property, between any of the good people of those States and any person, matter, or thing? Why, then, this excitement? All men may sit quietly, in all and each of the States, under the protection of their laws; for one kind of property is as perfectly secure to its owner as another. If, however, any jealousy of Northern people still exists in the minds of Southern people, be in patience with me—I will make one effort more to remove all cause for such feeling. It is true, laws cannot always protect, because they cannot always control. Morals, manners, habits, interest, make men what they are; and, when these are known, men are known, and, in any given state of events, their actions may become, with certainty and safety, a subject of calculations. Laws, indeed, may slumber; morals are vigilant as consciousness; interest watchful as the principle of self-preservation. For the purposes of what I would now say, the whole Northern communities may be regarded in one or another of three descriptions of persons. To neither of these classes can any motive, inconsistent with fair integrity, be objected. The first class is least numerous. They, of all men, think and act the least consequentially. If the thing they would have done be, by itself, honest and desirable, their mental vision never comprehends those eternal adjuncts of all human events, the things which must go before, and the things which must follow after them. They have, indeed, zeal—unbounded zeal—but they are entirely without that knowledge and wisdom indispensable to the accomplishment of any great enterprise. Slavery they regard as an evil, and freedom as a good—indeed, as all wise, good, and prudent men, in our country regard them. Immediate and universal emancipation is their only remedy for every case and condition of slavery. They say nothing, and think nothing, of the legal rights of masters thus at once extinguished, nor ask what condition of servitude could equal the wretchedness of a million and a half of slaves at once thrown out of the employment and the support, the protection and control of their masters. We need not be detained by a consideration of what this class of men would do; because they can do nothing. Their number is small, their wisdom small, and their influence still more inconsiderable. A few of these men may be found in the North; but I believe they are more numerous in the Southern parts of the Union.

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[JAN. 23, 1828.]

The second class should be denominated philanthropists. They would give freedom to all men; but they would violate the rights of none. They are the Howards of our country. As he did not make the pilgrimage of Europe to break gaols and liberate prisoners, but to make prisons the abodes of humanity, so would they not violate the rights of masters, but ameliorate the condition of slaves. Whatever they do, they will do it with justice to all men: now would they purchase what they so much desire, the freedom of all, at the expense of those higher and more desirable objects, the principles of morals and religion? The Colonization Societies of our country are of this class. I know men, who, though they may not be united with these societies, yet are they laboring in the same great cause. They are called Friends; and well do they merit the denomination. Their charities, like their devotions, though silent, are fervent and sincere. The slaves which they liberate are purchased with their own money, and sent, with all needful aid, to colonize their native land. Indeed, this great class of philanthropists look forward to the gradual and entire relief of our country from slavery, and the gradual peopling of Africa with freemen. The great moral debt of our nation will thus be paid. The children of Africa will carry back to their native land, arts, civilization, freedom, and Christianity. The toil and bondage of millions who are dead will be rewarded by the wealth and liberty of millions alive; and the Angels of Justice and Mercy, looking down on our world, may rejoice to behold the long lamented delinquency of one age so fully expiated by the transcend-ant remuneration of another. From this class of men—from these genuine philanthropists—numerous and influential as they may be, Southern men have nothing to fear.

A third class in the great community of the free States, equally regard law, justice and the rights of others; but they look on the connexion of master and slave with the eye of the mere politician. Their interests and habits of thinking, call them to a consideration of States and Nations as communities of People capable of wealth or poverty, imbecility or power. They make themselves acquainted with the statistics of different States, and compare one with another, to the intent that they may find which are most probable to excel in that mystery—in some degree the mystery of all men—the great trade and mystery of bettering their condition. Many important questions are involved in their theory; not only what kind of land and what kind of machinery, but what kind of labor, may be rendered most productive. Is it that of freemen, or is it that of slaves? The keen investigation of this class of men in our country, and of the like class of men in other countries, has finished and solved this great question. What was a problem in the civilized world one century ago, has now become an axiom in political science. It is now believed by this whole class of politicians in the North, that slave labor is much less productive than the labor of freemen. It is believed that such as labor for themselves, and who, by superior industry, skill, and faithfulness, may better their own condition, will more probably have and exercise these qualities for the benefit of themselves and their employers, than slaves, who cannot, by any exertions, in any considerable degree, improve their own condition, or, in any event, relieve themselves from bondage, or servitude. Hope is the animating principle of free, fear the fatiguing motive of slave labor. The reward of hope quickens, the fear of punishment paralyzes, exertion. The free laborer consumes with economy; and, with that care and parsimony which are the greatest cause of national accumulation, lays by a part of that portion of production belonging to himself, wherewith to build the foundation of a little capital of his own. Inconsiderable as these savings may individually be, in any one year, yet, when united, they make a great part of the sum total of the savings of any nation; and are not unfrequently the origin of immense private fortunes. In slave labored States, such parsimony and such accumulation cannot be expected, nor is it ever found. Why should the slave spare in consumption, when he can neither accumulate for himself or for his children? All these things are known to this race of politicians—these men of worldly wisdom. They are pleased with their own condition, because they know that condition is more conducive to prosperity than that of slave holding States. These Northern men will never disturb the tenure by which Southern men hold this evil. No, sir, so long as this class of men understand their own interest, are mindful of it, and desirous to outstrip the holders of slaves in bettering their own condition, so long will the master and slave be held to the present relations, according to all the provisions of the Constitution.

From neither of these classes, therefore, have Southern men any thing to apprehend, or to produce any excitement. The enthusiasts will not disturb them, for they have not the power to do it. The philanthropists will not do it; for they will not, for any supposed good, violate even the legal rights of others. From the politicians they have nothing to apprehend; because they will not only not break through the laws of their country for any purpose whatever, or better the condition of any man against his own will, but because they will not diminish the political weight and influence of themselves, and their own States, for any purpose of augmenting that of other men, or other States. No; be ye assured, throughout all the regions of the South, the philanthropist will never unjustly relieve the slave from his master; the politician will never illegally relieve the master from the slave. I have thus far labored to quiet all this Southern excitement, by endeavoring to demonstrate, that Congress have no constitutional right to legislate on the property relation of master and slave; and that Northern men, by their principles of morality and religion, their habits of thinking, and the attachments they continually feel for their own interest, can have no disposition, either unjustly or illegally, to interrupt, or call in question, this relation. Suffer me to say, Sir, that every gentleman of the South on this floor, has from me a high pledge of my candor and sincerity in this debate. I have a brother, dearer to me than almost any other man, who lives in one of the most Southern States, and is there a planter to no inconsiderable extent. Believe me, for the reasons I have given you; if not, believe me for my fraternal feelings. Be assured, I would neither overthrow his rights, nor interrupt his repose.

One thing, of a different nature, has been said in the course of this debate, which to me, seems peculiarly of a kind to produce, either here or elsewhere, some degree of excitement. It has been alleged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] that the opposers of this amendment, if they sustain their opposition at all, must sustain it by what, as he says, virtually amounts to an interpolation of the Constitution. He contends that they must read the last clause of the 5th article of the amendment; "Nor shall private property (unless it be property in slaves,) be taken for public use, without just compensation." Has any gentleman on this floor expressed any such opinion? Has any gentleman contended that property in slaves should be taken for public use, without just compensation? I have not heard it; nor do I believe any gentleman who will vote against this amendment, will vote against it for any such reason. Could I, Sir, so debase the Constitution of my country, I should feel my principles degraded below the level of that very ordinary kind of morality, found indispensable in keeping together communities, least of all scrupulous in rule, or the character of their actions. Could that line (unless it be property in slaves,) be placed in our great national charter, and placed there with all the solemnities of a constitutional amendment, and placed there, too, by a single, and a silent wish, I do believe, Sir, that man is not in this House, who would make the wish. Should the People believe we hold such doctrines here, I should cease to be surprised at the excitement of the South; should be utterly astonished at the quietude of the North. Those who sent me here, have a due regard for their property; and just, indeed, it is, and very natural that they should; for that property is the reward of their toil, enterprise, and perseverance. Nevertheless, no portion of it which I might by advocating such a measure, save to them, could ever redeem me from their just contempt, could I so aid in corrupting the pure text of the Constitution.

No, Sir, the opposers of this amendment direct their opposition by the great principles of the Constitution, and of all free Republics. As their fathers did not purchase, so they will not defend, their independence by the blood of slaves. Nor is this doctrine at all impugned by the resolution of the Continental Congress, passed March 29, 1779, as quoted from their Secret Journal by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRYAN.] For, although that resolution authorized South Carolina and Georgia to raise an Army of 3,000 black men, yet, the very next resolution, and on the same day, provided for the purchase of them by the United States, before they were sent into the Army—and for their emancipation, and a bounty of fifty dollars to each who should faithfully perform the duty of a soldier. Rhode Island was governed by the same principle, and acted up to the very letter of it. At the commencement of the Revolutionary war, she had a number of this description of People. A regiment of them was enlisted into the continental service; and no braver men met the enemy in battle; but not one was permitted to be a soldier, until he had first been made a free man. From that day to this, the same principle has prevailed; and slaves not only have not been impressed, but they have never been suffered to be enlisted by their masters into the Army.

Those, Sir, who oppose this amendment, do indeed contend for an alteration in the 5th article of the amendment to the Constitution; but, it is an alteration, according to this great principle. They would have it read thus: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation"—nor shall any property in slaves ever be so taken. State our object as it is, and our reading of the Constitution as we read it, and both will be found fair, honorable and patriotic. State them as they are not, but as it is contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts they may be stated, and I know not what condition of humanity would not feel degraded by any attempt to sustain them.

[Mr. EVERETT rose to explain. The gentleman entirely misconceived his remark. I stated not that those who opposed the amendment wished to introduce a qualification into the clause of the Constitution in question, but that such was the operation of a rejection of the amendment. Mr. E. expressly said, that he knew and felt that no one could wish to introduce the qualification.]

It has been contended in this debate, that the right to impress is, in the commanding General of an Army, a perfect right. He has the full power of the sovereignty; he can take all; take all for the common defence; all persons, all property; the master and slave, the father and son; and he has the same power over what comes under his command by impressment, as he has over what comes there by contract. He is endowed with the eminent domain; the transcendental power of the sovereignty. This question does not call for any support from such principles. Why they are advanced at this time, and in the present condition of our country, may, for all purposes of this discussion, be very safely left to the determination of those gentlemen who have, as sound doctrines, introduced them, I believe, for the first time, into a debate in any Congress of these United States. Yes, Sir, for the first time this House, the hallowed temple of liberty, the sanctuary of freedom, has been profaned by the publication of doctrines, odious to the ear of slavery itself; and never uttered aloud, and in the pure light of day, even by the most absolute despotism. Against these, I beg leave to bear my humble testimony, and freely to express the most unqualified execration of them. A very short examination of the nature of our Government will demonstrate the utter absurdity of all such principles.

[Mr. McDUFFIE said, I rise, Mr. Speaker, to make a question of order: And in order that we may decide the question correctly, I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to state, who is that member of this House who contended that a military officer has a right to impress a citizen? And if it shall turn out, as I believe it will, that no gentleman has maintained such a doctrine, I contend that it is not in order for the gentleman from Rhode Island to go into a formal argument against a right to impress freemen, upon a proposition to indemnify an individual for the impressment of a negro slave.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[JAN. 23, 1838.]

Mr. REED stated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTINDALE] had contended yesterday, that a military officer had a right to impress a citizen.

Then, said Mr. McDUFFIE, the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Rhode Island may settle that question between themselves.]

A commanding general [said Mr. BURGESS] can have no more power than Congress has: for he receives all his power from them; and they cannot communicate to others what has not been given to them. We cannot fairly reason from the powers of European Governments, to shew the powers of our own. The Governments of Europe have all the power, not wrested from them by the People; while our Government has no more power than has been given to them by the People. In this country, the great residuary power is with the People; in that, it is with the Government. All the Governments of Europe had a feudal origin. The Roman power, that iron despotism which had, for six centuries, set its foot on the neck of all civilized nations, was, after years of conflict, broken in pieces, by numerous armies of martial barbarians. These were led on to the conquest by numerous warlike chieftains. When the victory was achieved, they divided their plunder, according to their rude notions of justice. When this was done, they formed a number of Military Governments, being the only system of polity which such men were capable of conceiving, or keeping in operation when formed. The lands were parcelled out to their subordinate officers, as their great feudatories; and on the condition, among others, of aiding the chieftain with military service in his wars. The duration of their military service was stipulated in the grant. Nearly all the present Governments of Europe originated in this manner; and are derived from those Military Governments. Even then, the chieftain could call his feudatory into the field, for only a certain and limited number of days. He could neither impress him, or any of his immediate retainers; nor take from him one of his servants or slaves. When the Sovereigns of Europe changed this military system, the tenure of lands, by chivalry, was abolished. Armies were formed by mercenaries or volunteers. Men holding lands under him, could no longer be called on, as of right, by the Sovereign, to do military service. In England the whole tenure, by which lands were holden, was, in the reign of Charles the Second, changed to that of free and common socage. Since that time, no King of England can exact personal military services; and George the Fourth, wearing the crowns of three Kingdoms, with the titular sovereignty of France in addition, cannot impress into his armies the poorest and most defenceless man in his dominions. Let me ask, sir, has the Congress of the United States more power over the citizens of the several States, than the King of Great Britain has over his own subjects? Why, sir, the first settlers of this country, who came from England brought with them "all and singular the rights and liberties of Englishmen." Their charters were, that of Rhode Island I know was, "to have and to hold their lands by the tenure of free and common socage." How does it then come to pass that Englishmen cannot be impressed into the army by the military officers of their King; while the People of the United States, both "master and servant, father and son" may be impressed by their own military officers into their own armies? Did we indeed lose the liberty of freeborn English subjects, when we achieved the independence of the American States? Even in feudal days, in England, the ranks of war were filled more by a gallant spirit of knighthood, the glorious patriotism of chivalry, than by the exercise of any legal power in the Sovereign. Would to God, sir, that ancient valor of soul, that high enthusiasm of patriotic spirit had redeemed our country from this public avowal of the right or the necessity of military impressment. Sir, the press-gang of England, to man their Navy, is an engine of power, sanctioned by no law, or ever justified by any English lawyer; and he who resists the exercise of it upon himself, even unto blood, will find a perfect justification in the laws of his country.

Congress, Sir, have power by the Constitution to raise armies. This may be done by either enlistment, or by hiring auxiliaries, or by calling out the militia, to aid in the execution of the laws, to suppress insurrection, or to repel the invasion of any State or Territory. Can this Congress raise armies in any other manner? Can they enact a law, whereby any person in the United States may be impressed, and thereby fill up the ranks of the Army? This law, to have any effect, must find some portion of the People whereon to be put in legal execution. Can it be executed on the militia? By the Constitution, Congress can organize the militia. They may, as they have done, form all able bodied, free white citizens into companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions. These are equipped, accoutered, and officered; for all this is expressed or implied in the Constitutional power of organization. The militia may be called out for any constitutional purpose, and during any length of time provided by law: but they can be called out as militia only; for they must, says the Constitution, be commanded by their own officers appointed by their own States. How, then, sir, can Congress make a law, whereby the militia may be impressed; picked out, man by man, from the ranks of their own regiments, taken from the command of their own officers, and placed in the ranks of the Army, and under the command of the officers of the United States? No, sir, the militia cannot, not a man of them, be impressed; nor could any one, after enrolment, enlist into the army of the United States, had not the law for organizing the militia, expressly reserved to them the right so to enlist. Your law, for raising an army by impressment, must, sir, if it operate at all, operate on People other than the militia of your country. You cannot, from that constitutional bulwark of our nation, pick down so much as one stone, brick, or bit of fractured cement, by any minion of military despotism, acting under any law ever enacted, or to be enacted by this Congress. Your law of impressment must, then, be executed on those exempted from service, under the organization of the militia. These are all such as, by condition, or by age, being too young, or too old, or by employment, or office, are exempted from military service, in war or in peace. The whole mass of slaves in our country are, by their condition, exempted and excluded from military service. Both sides of the House will agree to this proposition. Policy does not permit their masters to place them in the ranks of the army; nor does justice authorize the United States to impress and send them there. No man can justly be received, or compelled to fight for liberty, without first being made legally capable of enjoying it. You will, therefore, make no law to raise Armies, by authorizing the impressment of slaves. Will you enact a law to conscribe, and, and take by violence, from the nurture, education, and instruction, of parental care, guardianship, and affection, the whole childhood of your country; and fill the rough ranks of war with the tender and unseasoned limbs of infancy? If there were not a physical impossibility interposed between any such law and the object of it; yet are the high moral principles of filial and parental relation, so paramount in the heart of every man, woman, and child, of this nation, that such a law could never outlive the hour of its enactment.

Will you impress those exempted by their advanced age, and send your fathers and grand fathers to fight your battles, because their more prudent sons refuse to join the army by enlistment? These men have purchased their exemption by military service, already performed. You have received the consideration; can you take back that for which they have fully paid you? Not, sir, with justice; and what you cannot do with justice, you cannot constitutionally do. Indeed, sir, I believe our nation has, and ever will have, enough of Spartan courtesy, if not of Spartan valor, to revere the character, and hold inviolate the venerable rights of age. Other persons are exempted by their employments. Will you extinguish the lights on your coast, that you may place their keepers in your armies, or profit by the salvage of shipwreck on your shores? Will you abolish commerce, that you may impress sailors? or give up revenue, for the sake of placing custom-house officers under military command? The transmission of public and private intelligence employs, in the direction and conveyance, a large number of men: Will you impress all these into the ranks of war, and leave all knowledge of passing events to be transported from one place or one person to another, by special messengers—or “to be blown about by the viewless couriers of the air?” In each of the several States, and in the United States, is a numerous, learned, and highly respected body of Judges. These are all exempted from duty in the organized militia of the several States. Will you make a law authorizing their impressment? Do, sir, let it be so enacted, that the recruiting officers of some military chief, high in command, may, by that power which can “take all,” bring forward from each State in the Union each venerable bench, and place them under review in front of this Hall. When this is done, send at least a corporal and file of soldiers to the other end of this building. Let “the pure ermine of justice” be contaminated by the touch of military violence. Bring out the venerable Chief Justice, and his learned associates. We shall reduce to fact what was once a mere sarcastic fiction; you will really have “an army of Judges.” The streams of justice will indeed be cut off at the fountain; her sanctuary will be profaned in the very persons of her consecrated priesthood. But, what then? The judicial will merely be rendered subordinate to the legislative, and all to the military power; and “law will then be silent amidst arms.” Congress will but have to add one section more to their law of impressment, and comprehend the Legislatures of the several States in the sweeping provisions of it: for it is presumed no Congress will ever make a law rendering themselves liable to the exercise of this “eminent domain,” this transcendent military power, which “has a perfect right to take all.” No, sir; a law of impressment to “raise armies” cannot be made: for you cannot impress those exempted from the militia; because they are so exempted by laws paramount to the Constitution. And you cannot impress the militia, because they are exempted by the Constitution.

This doctrine of impressing freemen involves a moral absurdity. All power is given to Congress by the will of the People; but all impressment is the exercise of power against the will of the People. How, then, can it flow from their voluntary grant? All impressment is the exercise of despotic power—a power uncontrolled by any thing other than the will of him who exercises it; but all granted power must be limited and exercised according to the will of him who grants it. Despotic power, like slavery, can never originate in compact.—Liberty is unalienable. How can a man sell himself to be a slave, since the very consideration he may receive for his liberty, will, the moment he becomes a slave, revert to his master, and thereby, for want of consideration, render the contract nugatory?

Wisdom is ever schooled by experience—let us examine her lessons: We have had two wars; the first long, dangerous, and difficult; the second not so long, attended with less danger, but with some difficulties. Neither the Continental Congress, nor the Congress of the United States, ever exercised, or contended that they could exercise, the power to enact any law of impressment, either to raise or recruit their armies. If, therefore, Congress can have no such power, how can commanding Generals, acting under the laws of Congress, have any such power? Did Washington ever exercise, or claim such power? No, sir; much as he was almost adored by the People of this country, any attempt at impressment, would have brought him down to the level of mere ordinary humanity. Shall any General, since his time, in this country, exercise, and be justified in exercising, this odious power? Who in this House would have suffered the exercise, upon himself or his sons, of it? Shall we believe that the poorest freeman in the country has less of the spirit of freedom and generous manhood than the wealthiest and proudest man in the nation? It was once nobly said, “The poor man’s house is his castle. The winds of Heaven may blow through it—but the King dares not enter.” In this country, shall the Congress, or the Commanding General, dare to enter? It may be rude and unfinished, but his fire-side is the home of his comforts, the altar of his devotion, the sanctuary of his wife and children; and shall the unhallowed foot of violence profane his threshold? What man of you all, who now hear me, would endure the paltry minion of a military despot to rudely enter your dwelling, and choose between yourself and your son, which he would drag to the recruiting house, there to be measured and mustered for the ranks of the army?

Let me ask, why should this power to raise armies by impressment have been given to Congress? Will not the People know, quite as well as their public servants here, when a war is necessary? When they believe it to be so, it will be popular with them. When they want a war, they will enlist, volunteer, run to the battle field, as was done in the Revolutionary war. The Constitution, which gives Congress all the power they can of right exercise, was formed by those men, and formed not long after they had achieved our independence. Did they not remember the valor wherewith that war had been conducted? Did they forebode the degeneracy of their race, and therefore provide this constitutional cure for cowardice? And lest, peradventure, their sons and descendants should not voluntarily defend their liberty and independence, gave power to Congress to provide for having them dragged into the ranks of their own armies? No, sir; this Constitution, by providing that “no man shall be deprived of liberty, but by due course of law,” provides that no innocent man shall ever be deprived of liberty; nor even the guilty, until accused, tried, convicted, and sentenced to a loss of it, by imprisonment. Sir, not until martial law shall become the law of the land, and the whole country shall be formed into one vast camp, need we fear impressment, either without law, or by force of any legislative enactment.

Cannot property be taken for public use, by the Commanding General? It can be taken no otherwise, by him, than it can be taken by Congress. They are told by the Constitution, “Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.” Just compensation has reference to the value of the consideration paid, as well as to the time of payment. He who takes property, unless he contracts to pay at a future day, does not make just compensation, unless he pays when he receives the property. Notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND] a mere promise to pay is no compensation; especially if made by the United States, against which you can have no compulsory process. The United States are continually making contracts, and receiving the lands of individuals, either for light-houses, fortifications, or other purposes. They cannot seize and confiscate these lands. An appropriation is made by Congress, to make payment, upon receiving the conveyance. The owner makes a deed of the land to the United States, and, if he be wise, he will not deliver this deed to the agent until he receives his money. I do not know of any other, nor have I ever heard of any other method, in this country, of obtaining specific private property for public use. The great sources of ways and means, by which Congress can raise a revenue, are imposts, duties, excises, taxes, and loans. By these they provide for the general defence, and not by impressment and military exaction. What, sir, can a General take, when he cannot take the lodging of a single soldier, in any man's house, even in time of war, unless a law be first made regulating the manner in which it may be done? Who, then, will contend that a General may plunder the People he is sent to protect; stripping the very beds from under their children, and carrying away the whole food of their households? Why, sir, the very compensation law of the 9th of April, 1816, giving remuneration to such persons as had suffered from such impressments, by the military officers in the late war, demonstrates that Congress considered them all illegal. For it provides that all, who have recovered compensation of such officers, shall receive none of Congress, and all who have not, and who claim it here, shall, before receiving the amount of their claim allowed, execute a release to the officer who made the impressment.

It has been said, necessity will justify taking any thing. Necessity, sir, is named the tyrant's plea. What kind of necessity justifies any act? It is that which takes away law. Where necessity may be the rule of action, law cannot be the rule. Law ends where necessity begins: for necessity has no law. You throw overboard the cargo, to save the ship; the owner of the goods is not wronged, because, had you not done this, both ship and cargo would have been lost. Two men, escaping from a wreck, succeed in getting on the same plank; it can float but one of them; in the struggle for self-preservation, one is pushed off and drowned; the other reaches the shore. No wrong has been done: for, if one had not, both must have perished. Ten men are all the survivors in a foundered ship; they have no provisions; they agree to a decimation by lot. The death of one preserves the rest, till some pilgrim traveller of the ocean relieves them. His death was a calamity, not a wrong: for all must have died, if the death of one had not saved the other nine. In a burning city, a house, adjoining one already in flames, is blown up, to stop the progress of the fire. The owner of that house has suffered no injury: for his house would have been consumed by the fire, if it had not been destroyed to stop the progress of it. In a beleaguered city, cut off from all aid and succour from the country, every thing is brought forth to aid in the defence; the very women carry out their own food and that of their children, to refresh the men fighting on the walls. When a practicable breach is made by the enemy, houses are seen to have been demolished, and another wall is already erected within. No injury is done to the owners by this mode of defence; because, if the enemy had succeeded, he would have deprived them of all they possessed. So it is in re-capturing a city; and so where the armies of the country meet to repulse the invading enemy: whatever is destroyed by the march or conflict, would have been taken or destroyed by the enemy, if it had not been so destroyed on the field of battle. These are cases of necessity.

Now, sir, did any such necessity exist in the defence of New Orleans? The condition of that city has, in this debate, been placed before us, and colored by a description of all the calamities of a beleaguered town, cut off from all possibility of aid, to be derived from the Government or surrounding country. The fact was not so. New Orleans was open to the populous and wealthy States of the West. Were they slow in sending succours? No, sir; every wave of their own mighty rivers rolled down, freighted with the strength, the arms, and the valor, of those patriotic regions. Contemporaneous prejudice may for a time triumph over truth, but history, impartial history, will do justice to that People; nor leave to the FUTURE ORATOR in this House a shadow of claim to declare, "that New Orleans could not have been defended without impressing" master and slave, father and son. Nor will I believe, sir, that the gallant people of that devoted city waited to be impressed into their own defence. The blood of the Goth, the Frank, and the Saxon, mingles in their veins; and when was either race known to go back from the face of danger? No, sir: all property was ready, and tendered to the public service; all persons stood to their arms, and waited only for the command. There was no treachery, no disaffection, no skulking to escape danger. It has been said, sir, the invading foe promised to his soldiery all the rewards of a licentious brutality: gold to the avaricious, beauty to the profligate. I would to God, for the honor of the English name, it were not so; but so it has been told, and so it is believed. Was this watchword echoed through the streets of Orleans, and was there a husband, a father, a brother, who did not fly to the defence? Why, sir, the timorous sheep will stamp, and menace the howling and ferocious wolf, in defence of her lamb; and the tame and spiritless hen screams and flies at the descending hawk, to protect her little brood. The very slave will die, with his best blood, the threshold, to guard his master's house from pollution. Who, then, can say, that men, brave men, the valor and chivalry of New Orleans, did, or could, on that day, wait to be compelled into defence—I do not say of their city, their wealth, their houses, their firesides—but of the cherished honor, the pure loveliness, of their sisters, and wives, and daughters? The very surmise is a foul and tainting calumny. Whoever has put it on paper, has, sir, uttered and published a libel against our nation and our race. I dare aver the very slave in question was proud to be at "camp" on the first of January, 1815; and though an attempt be now made to coin his wound into money, yet Warwick did then, and will, to the day of his death, boast, that he received it at the defence of New Orleans.

What, then, is this case, or what would it have been, had not gentlemen thought proper to press into the discussion principles perilous to the repose and the liberties of their country? Marigny D'Auterive claims of the United States $1094. Of this sum $755 have been allowed, and the balance of it was rejected by your Committee of Claims. Twenty-four dollars of this balance is the amount of a private Surgeon's bill for attending and curing the claimant's slave, Warwick, who was wounded while working in the trenches before New Orleans, on the 1st of January, 1815. The second item of this balance is $15, for lost time, being one month, while Warwick was under the care of the Surgeon: $200, the last item in the account, is claimed, because the slave is made so much less valuable by his wounds. The Surgeon's bill was rejected by your committee, because all persons wounded in the service, if carried to the army hospitals, are attended and cured, if they can be cured, be regular Surgeons, without any private expense; but all who choose not to go there, when in their power, must be attended and cured at their own charge. From this rule the Committee of Claims have never departed. The other items are rejected, because such persons have never been considered as property, in such cases, to be paid by the United States. This amendment, now offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GUALTIER] restores these disallowed items to the account. The sum in question is indeed small, but the principles directly involved, and those brought into the debate, are truly great and alarming. If we vote against this amendment, we leave the question of property in slaves just as it ever has been, and is now. If we vote in favor of the amendment, we must first vote that such persons are property, and then, that they are, in such cases, to be paid for by the United States. Important reasons seem to urge us to reject this amendment.

I will pass over the fact, that this claim originated thirteen years ago, and that it was never presented here until the last Congress. Though indeed a stale claim, it may not, for that reason, be unjust. The owner may have thought it advisable to wait until, in the course of things, claims of this description could be introduced into Congress, under the expectation of more favorable auspices. Be all that as it may be.

This does not come within any description of claims contained in the statute of April 9th, 1816, called the compensation law. That provides, 1st. For all saddle-horses of the militia, either killed, dying of their wounds, or for want of forage. 2d. For all loss by the destruction or capture of beasts of draught, as horses, mules, or oxen, or of vehicles of conveyance, as wagons, carts, boats, sleighs, and harness. 3d. All loss of arms and accoutrements, by capture or destruction. 4th. All loss by property impressed or taken for the use or subsistence of the Army, whether lost, destroyed, or consumed. 5th. All loss by destruction, by the enemy, of any house, or building, used by the United States as a place of military deposite. This statute was for two years executed by Commissioners; and though it then expired, yet has it ever since been the chart by which the Committee of Claims have directed their course. This claim comes within no description of claim provided for in that statute. All claims under that law must be for destruction of the thing of which the value is claimed. Whether arms, accoutrements, provisions, animals, vehicles, or buildings, they must have been destroyed. No damage is given for any diminution of value. Horses or mules may be foundered, oxen lamed, wagons and carts impaired, but the owners of them must, in all these cases, as in all labor for private men, keep their cattle and implements in working condition at their own proper expense, and lose their time, during which they are making these repairs, and not in the service of their employers. This claim is for lost time, and for diminished value, not for time while in the service, but while under the hand of the Surgeon. He went to the camp the 31st of December, he was wounded the 1st of January. The claim to be paid for time, is not time while in service, but lost time. His claim for damage, is not for the destruction of the slave, but because he is lame, and cannot do so much work, or will not sell for so much money. This statute, therefore, had it extended to the case of slaves, would not have extended to this case; because it provides for loss by the destruction of property, and not for loss by its diminished value.

Claims of this description have been made since the last war. We are told by the Committee on Claims, that they have been uniformly rejected. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESBY] who reported this bill, has stated and discussed a number of such cases. We have, sir, on this subject, what is most desirable on all legal subjects, a body of precedents for our direction. Depart from these, and you will soon perceive the consequences. This claim is but the vidette, the pioneer of an army of the same class. Suffer this to make a lodgement in this House, and there will follow a host, the numerous and unsatisfied reserve of all your Southern war. If we consider the nature of the public military service, we shall perceive the importance of this rule. In the Army there is, to each regiment of five hundred men, about fifty waiters. Each Commissioned or Staff Officer is entitled to one, and four are allowed to a General of Division. An Army of 10,000 fighting men must, of necessity, and may, by law, have at least 1000 such servants. One half of these are slaves, or may be such; the other are, or may be, free men, either white or colored. They are paid monthly wages, at the same rate as the infantry are paid. As the law now stands, under our present course of adjudication on claims, these army servants all fare alike. Vote this amendment, and you change the whole system. For the waiter, who is a slave, if damaged by disease, or wounds, the master will claim and receive compensation. The waiter, who is a free man, may suffer the same disasters, but he can have no other remedy than to leave the service, and go upon the parish.

The rule of decision pursued by the Committee of Claims, in this case, is of older date than the last war. Under the Confederation, and during the Revolutionary war, as it has been asserted, and cannot be denied, such claims were never admitted by the Continental Congress. At the commencement of that war, slaves were found in every State of the whole thirteen. Many of them, as servants, doubtless followed their masters into the Army. No inconsiderable number of these became, by disease or wounds, of little value to their owners; many perished under the hardships of the camp. What master claimed of the United States, and was allowed, damage by them for either the diminished value, or the entire loss of his slaves in the war? This question has been at rest for more than fifty years, for almost "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." It may be fairly considered as the settled common law of the United States.

Another view of this case will shew, how inadmissible we ought to consider such claims. Though the statute of compensation regards all impressment as illegal, and every such act as a trespass, yet it does presume impressments of certain kinds of property would have been made during the last war; for it provides in such cases a remedy for those who had suffered by the trespass, and a relief for those who had committed it. On the contrary, this law has provided no remedy and no relief for the impressment of slaves. What then? Did the law disregard the rights of masters? Not in the least. It does not touch that question. It was intended thereby to cut off every doubt, as to the right, either by the master or by the Congress, of using slaves, in any event, to recruit the Army. It gave no remedy for such impressment, and, therefore, left not even an implication that it might, in any event, be done. If, sir, slaves may be taken for any purpose, what shall hinder the commanding general from using them for any purpose he may choose? If he may impress one hundred, he may one thousand, or any greater number. If he can put in their hands the pick-axe and the spade, and send them to "fore-run a camp and trench a field," he can put arms in their hands, and draw them up in companies, battalions, regiments, to defend the field they have fortified. Nay, what hinders his marching them, and marshalling them on any other field? To avoid the possibility of such a result, the law forbore to hold out even the shadow of excuse for the impressment of slaves. The independence of our country was purchased by the blood of freemen; and, as the proud current, swelled from age to age by the streams poured out in its defence, shall pass down to our descendants, let us, like our fathers, scorn to contaminate its purity by one drop drawn from the veins of the slave.

It is true, minors were, in the last war, empowered to enlist into the armies of the United States. This was done, as was justly observed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] from the pressure of the times. What remedy, as the same gentleman demanded, has ever been provided, for those interested in their labor? It is true, the law gave a part of the bounty to those interested in the minor. To what did this amount? Not to so much as ten dollars. Why, sir, the last three years of the apprenticeship of a faithful, skilful, industrious young man, with any of our enterprising Northern mechanics, who have faithfully instructed those committed to their charge, whether sons or apprentices, is worth $600. This was swept away by enlistment. Has the compensation law provided any remedy? None. And none has ever been claimed. God forbid that I should place the relation of father and son, instructor, and apprentice, of our freeborn Northern men, on a footing with that of master and slave. The first is the bond of reciprocal aid and kindness, and the charities of nature, and would exist if there were no human laws on earth; the last is, I grant you, strong; for it is the iron chain, forged by the powerful hand of municipal regulation. It cannot be reached, it is allowed, by Congress; for it is entirely of State jurisdiction. Are not the laws of apprenticeship, and of sonship, equally of State jurisdiction? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERTS] has said the law of the United States took away the power of the father over the son, and, by carrying him forward out of his minority, three years earlier than he otherwise would have been, rendered him capable of contracting to serve his country. I have, sir, no belief that the United States have any authority to abrogate the parental power, even if it existed only in the laws of State jurisdiction. It has a higher sanction; the unchangeable relations of nature; the laws of God, paramount to all human legislation. Its object is the perfect education of the son. It begins with the cradle, it ends in his entire mandood; the maturity of his body and mind. During its whole course, it is a reciprocation of benefits. At first they are, indeed, nothing to the father, but the smile, the caress, and the joyous gratitude of infancy; at last, relief, assistance, and substantial remuneration. Can the son forget, and shall laws be formed to make him forget, that his father cared for him, and labored for him, while he slept on his mother's bosom? Let every man read his own heart; he will find the laws of this relationship indelibly written there. I beg leave to say, sir, if there be any memory of my own past life, which comes back to me with feelings not to be touched by time or discolored by any condition of existence, it is the grateful recollection that I wrought out the full term of my legal minority, under the power of my father, in aiding him to cultivate his fields. No, sir, the law of filial obligation, of paternal authority, cannot be abrogated by civil enactments. Sparta took children from their parents; but the State became the parent. The Lacedemonians were not a commonwealth of citizens. They were an army; their city was a camp; and they were mere warriors. The Hebrew paternal power, like the Roman, was great, and was confirmed by all the sanctions of the decalogue. Men were, however, found in that nation who could advocate its abrogation. The traditions of the Sanhedrim, and the lectures of the Synagogue, subverted this law of Moses; and he who would devote his services on the altar, and pronounce it "a gift," was released from the law of his parents, and thereby became capable of serving the State. This was the tradition of the Corban, and such as taught its doctrines were denounced by the Saviour of the World, as those who "made void the laws of God by the commands of men."

II. or R.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[JAN. 23, 1828.]

We have been told by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] that the minor may be compelled to serve, because he is a member of the body politic. The slave cannot be so compelled, because he is not a member. What, sir, constitutes this membership of the body politic? Not a want of perfect understanding; for then would all young children be excluded;—no: a privation of the right of suffrage: else all minors, all women, and all destitute of legal property qualifications, would cease to be parts of the nation. Nor can a condition of labor work this political privation. Are not all natural persons, who are within the protection of the law, members of the body politic? What is the great legal bond, uniting all parts of that body? It is allegiance. Whoever owes allegiance to any nation, must be one of that nation, at least so far as that nation can claim his allegiance. Allegiance and protection are reciprocal. Whoever owes allegiance is entitled to protection; and whoever is entitled to protection owes allegiance. Is not the slave entitled to protection? Can any man beat, or maim, or kill him, and not be punished for the trespass, or the homicide, just as if he had committed these offences on the body of a free man? "The gentleman says the United States cannot punish, because the slave belongs to the State jurisdiction." What if the murder be done in a fort, or arsenal? Will the offender go unpunished? For it is manifest he cannot be tried in any State for any act done within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. No; the United States alone, in such cases, can try, and punish. If the slave commit a crime, will he escape punishment as an ox or a horse would, because he is not a member of the body politic? What if he levy war, or carry aid and comfort to the enemy—would the plea of slavery exempt him from punishment? No, sir, the slave, equally with the minor, is a member of the body politic. Base indeed must be that law which would give a compensation for the value of the slave, so far as diminished by the accidents of military service, and, at the same time, abolishing the rights and the obligations of minority, send your free-born sons to have their limbs shred away in battle, and give their fathers no title to relief.

If it be true that all laws, creating the relation called property, are laws of State jurisdiction, how can we here decide the great question of slavery? How often have we been told that we cannot decide it? That the decision would cost our constitution. We do every thing here by enactment. Before we can adopt the amendment we must first enact that persons may be property; and then, that the man Warwick was the property of the claimant. In the States, such persons may be property, or not, just as State laws enact: for we have no jurisdiction over the question. In this Legislature, gentlemen represent them as persons: and he, who comes here, because they are persons, cannot, under that Constitution, which pronounces them such, vote that they are mere property. Our Constitution admits no representation of property; persons alone are represented. He, therefore, who votes that his constituents are property, votes to vacate his own seat on this floor; and if this amendment prevail, and this House vote that such persons are property, they in effect vote that the Representatives of one million and a half of "such persons" ought to vacate their seats. We can, therefore, by the Constitution, consider "such persons" as "Warwick" in no other light than persons; and so not to be in such cases "paid for by the United States." Should it be said, that three-fifths only of such persons are represented, it does not follow that the other two-fifths are property. Take the objection in the liberal manner of the maker of it, and allow that three-fifths only of each of "such persons" are represented, and in that case, the man having three-fifths, has evidently therein a fair majority over the beast. To be serious, the ratio of representation is different only, between persons, and "such other persons" as are alluded to in the Constitution. Three of the first, and five of the last, have an equality in representation; or 40,000 white men, and 66,666 colored men, are entitled each to but one representative. To compensate this seeming inequality, the 40,000 pay the same amount of tax as the 66,666. The mystery of this difference is explained by the history of the country. When the Constitution was formed, it was then believed, that direct taxes would be the principal source of revenue to the United States, both for the support of the Government, and the payment of the national debt. If five are represented as three, so, also, are five taxed as three persons. The conclusion still returns upon us, that, as the Constitution considers them as persons only, so can we, constitutionally, consider them as persons only, and not as property.

This amendment involves a very remarkable principle of injustice. In all cases of claim arising from the circumstances of the last war, the United States have been called upon to pay, and they have paid, in cases of loss by destruction, either by the army, or the enemy. No damage sustained, either in cattle or vehicles of transportation, has been claimed or allowed. This is a new claim; it is for deterioration; and made because the slave is of less value now than when he went into the service. How many wagons, carts, boats, sleighs, and harnesses; how many horses, mules, and oxen, were deteriorated in the service, and thereby reduced to less than half their value. This was inevitable, from the nature of the service.—None of these have received any compensation; and neither ought this man, by the same rule of justice, to receive any.

Great reliance has been placed on the manner of bringing this man in the service. D'Auterive's man Warwick was taken into the service, either by impressment, and against the will of his master, or by contract, and with the consent and agreement of the master. Gentlemen may take which side of the alternative they like best. Was he impressed against the will of the master? Then was the impressment either legal or illegal. Those gentlemen who have contended for the rights of the commanding General to impress all, must say that the impressment, if made, was legal. It was, therefore, no trespass; and so no damages for a trespass can be claimed, or are to be paid. The claim is on an implied contract for the value of the labor while in service. If, however, he were impressed, I do not allow he was legally taken. No, Sir, not for the sake of the argument, or even to carry the question, would I for a moment grant it. If, therefore, Warwick had been impressed, he was illegally taken. The act of taking was a trespass in the man who impressed him into the service. Why then, may not D'Auterive recover the value of the injury done to his man, as damages for the trespass? So he might, if he should choose to bring his action against him. It appears, by a receipt in the papers, dated December 31, 1814, that Warwick was received of D'Auterive on that day, by one of the Syndics of the city of New Orleans, and for the purpose of sending him into service at the camp. If this were impressment, he might recover his whole claim of this Syndic. Why then refuse it here? This is a question of some importance, but the answer is easily made. The United States were no party to the trespass; no, not by the remotest implication. Can there be any law authorizing a trespass? The United States can act only by a law. If, therefore, there were a trespass, it could not be done by the United States. Can even a corporation be guilty of a trespass? If the directors of a bank vote, at one of their meetings to burn a house, each of them may be punished for the arson; but the innocent corporation could neither be indicted nor punished. The United States, therefore, if a trespass were committed, were no parties to it, and are not answerable for it, or for any more than the labor of Warwick while in their service. If, however the fact would make any difference, it is out of the case: for it appears that Warwick was sent to the service by the consent of D'Auterive, his master. This is presumable from all the circumstances of the case, and it is proved by the papers translated, and laid on the table of every gentleman of the House. General Jackson sent an order to the Mayor of New Orleans, for a number of men to work at the trenches. One of the Syndics received, as he says, Warwick, for that purpose. No man in this House will, or can say he was received or sent against the will of the claimant. He was in the service on contract, and for a compensation to be paid for his services. He went to the works, December 31st. He was wounded and went home the next day, January 1st. For these two days, D'Auterive is entitled to be paid, unless he has been paid already. He cannot, in justice, claim any thing for the diminished value of his man. He was in the service, just as if a commanding General, or a Canal Commissioner, had advertised for five hundred carts to work at the entrenchment, or the excavation. At the end of the week, they are called to be paid off. Each man presents one bill for his week's work, and another for the repairs of carts, fendered legs, dislocated shoulders, and put-out eyes of men and horses. What man, in his senses, would pretend that one single man of them would be, by any rule of justice, entitled to a single cent for the diminished value of a single cart, horse, or driver?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] has contended, that Warwick was in this service at the risk of the United States, and not of the claimant. In answer to this, let it be remembered, that he was sent to the works by the consent and by the agreement of the claimant. At whose risk are all the lives, limbs, and property, in any country? Why, truly, at the risk of those who are the owners of them. This will ever be the case, until the owner makes a contract with some other person to take the risk, and ensure for him his life, or all, or any other part of his property. This is universally true of all trades and employments. In some few cases of carrying or keeping, the law, for specific reasons, has put the property at the risk of the carrier, or keeper. This contract of insurance, must, from the nature of it, be express, and in terms, and is never implied by law. Did D'Auterive make any such contract with the Syndic of New Orleans, when he agreed to send Warwick to work at the camp? It is not pretended, or attempted to be proved. The man was, therefore, at the risk of the master, and, if lessened in value, if deteriorated, he has no claim to be put in a better condition, than the property or the limbs of other men.

I want words, sir, to express my regret that such a question, and for such an amount, should have been brought into debate on this floor—that such principles, and such terms, should have been pressed into the discussion. Why urge the question of slavery upon us, and, at the same time, declare that we dare not decide it? We have no right—we claim no right—we wish for no right—to decide the question of slavery. Men from the free States have already decided the question for themselves, within their own State jurisdiction; and such men, to decide it here for other States, must first be renegade from the Constitution, or oblivious of its high and controlling principles. When has this question been raised, and not by men interested in its eternal slumber? The Missouri Question was, as it has truly been said on this floor, no triumph. It was no triumph of policy; it was no triumph of humanity. To contract, and not extend the theatre of it, is the true policy of every statesman, as well in the slave-holding as in those States uncursed by this moral and political mischief. On this matter of slavery, singular and ominous political events have, within the last forty years, transpired in the great community of the New World. What another half century will exhibit, is known to Him only who holds in his hands the destiny of nations. This kind of population is rapidly increasing; and, should any large and united number of them make a desperate struggle for emancipation, it will then be found, that the policy which had placed aid and relief at any greater distance, was cruelly and fatally unwise. Humanity surely did not triumph in that decision. It widened the mart of slavery. Southern men have nobly aided in driving from the ocean a traffic which had long dishonored our country, and outraged the best feelings of our nature. The foreign slave trade is now piracy. Would to God the domestic might, like his barbarous brother of the seas, be made an outlaw of the land, and punished on the same gibbet.

The Constitution, we know, does not permit one class of the States to legislate on the nature or condition of the property of the other class. Why tell us, for we already know, that neither our religion or our humanity can reach or release that condition. Humanity could once bathe the fevered forehead of Lazarus—she could not bring to his comfort so much as a crumb from the sumptuous and profuse table of Dives. Religion may weep, as the Saviour of the World wept over the proud city of Herod; but her tears will fall like the rain-drops on the burning plough share, and serve only to render the stubborn material more obdurate.

We are called and pressed to decide this question, and yet threatened, that the decision will dissolve the Union. "The discussion and the Constitution will terminate together." "Southern gentlemen will, in that event, leave this Hall." Who makes this menace, and against whom? It cannot be a war cry; can it be a mere party watch-word? On what event of immeasurable moment are we thus adjured? In a paltry claim of 200 and 9 and "30" pieces of silver, shall we, who have in this Hall, lifted the hand, or "kissed" the hallowed gospel of God, in testimonial of high devotion to its requirements, shall we now, in the same place, "deliver up" this our great national charter? This event, sir, cannot come with safety to our country, and wisdom would admonish us to enquire what concomitants may attend it; and whom they will visit most disastrously? Must we be schooled on the benefits of the Union? It were wise for such scholars to take some lessons on the evils of separation. The Hebrew, when fed by the bread of Heaven, murmured at his God; looked over sea, and pined for the luxurious slavery of Egypt. Is it a vain imagining, or may there be a charm in foreign alliance, more potent than the plain simplicity of domestic independence? England can, indeed, make Lords! The United States can make none. She, too, can, and has, in the last century, made more slaves than all other nations, Paynim or Christian.

We are surrounded, protected, and secured by our Constitution. By this we are in safety from the power and violence of the world; as some wealthy regions are, by their own barriers, sheltered from the ravages of the ocean. Do not forget, for they never forget, that a small insidious persevering reptile may, unseen, bore through the broadest and loftiest mound. The water follows his path, silently and imperceptibly at first, but the rock itself is worn away by the continual attrition of a perpetually running stream. A ravine—a breach is made—and the ocean rushing in, flocks and herds, and men, and the labors of men, are swept away by the deluge. Pause before you peril such a country; pause before you place in jeopardy so much wealth, and life, and intellect, and loveliness. Those of us, whose sun is far in the West, may hope to be housed before the storm. Be not deceived. Sparse and blanched as are our hairs, they may be defiled in the blood of our sons; and to you, who, in the pride of manhood, feel the warm blood dancing at your hearts, while you stand joyous in the blooming circle of household loveliness, the day may come, unless the all merciful God pours into the bosom of this nation the hallowed and healing spirit of mutual confidence and mutual conciliation—to you the tremendous day may come, when you shall sigh for the sad consolation of him, and envy his utter desolation of heart, who, before that hour, shall have sheltered his very last daughter in the sanctuary of the tomb. Do not understand me as I do not mean to be understood. Those who would avert the events of that catastrophe, do not stand here in mercy, or to menace, or to deprecate. They stand here amidst all the muniments of the Constitution. They will not desert the ship, leave her who may; they will perform the voyage, and to the very letter and in the full spirit of all and singular the shipping articles; and they, too, will, by the blessing of God, perform it without fear—prosperously as they trust, and with triumphant success.

Mr. WEEMS said, that, after such a flood of eloquence as had just been poured upon this House, it might appal any one, especially at so late an hour, to attempt to address the House. It had been his intention to answer all the gentlemen who had taken side against the amendment; but as he had been so late in obtaining the floor, he should confine himself to the gentleman behind him, [Mr. BURGESS] and if he could succeed in answering his arguments, he should consider himself as having virtually replied to all the rest. He thought he could do this—he hoped he should not be accused of egotism if he said that he believed himself able to convince even the gentleman himself—and that from the arguments he had himself advanced—and especially from the very authority the gentleman had quoted in such a powerful and impressive a manner. He would remind him, in the language of the same sacred volume, "let him that thinketh he knoweth all things, remember that he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know." The gentleman had erected a beautiful edifice, it was poked over the foundation to the dome with the utmost care—but it was erected on a sand bank. His whole argument had been built on the supposition that slaveholders rest their claim upon the ground that it is lawful to impress. Now, said Mr. W., we deny this utterly: we hold that there is no law for it—that it results only from necessity, and necessity has no law, either for or against it. The gentleman told us that he feared there was still a longing among some members of the House for the fleshpots of Egypt. If the gentleman meant this for me, I throw back the imputation with disdain. Would to God—

[Here the SPEAKER interposed and said that the gentleman from Rhode Island had not been understood by him as making any personal allusions, and no such matter now be made—the gentleman from Maryland was out of order.]

The gentlemen said further, that he would to God, for the sake of England and the English character, that no such facts as those we have all heard in respect to the attack on New Orleans, had ever happened, and intimated his belief that they were not as has been represented. Sir, we have been assured that these facts did happen—that the watchword of booty and beauty was given, and this is the first time I ever heard it doubted. The gentleman, however, wishes to God, for the sake of the British character, that the accounts are not true—he wishes that we might lose the glory of having conquered the invincibles of the old world, rather than the British character should be tarnished. He tells us that we have all kissed the book to support the Constitution, and that by that Constitution we are the Representatives of those whom we wish to call property. The gentleman shakes his head. I certainly do not wish to misrepresent him, but I so understood him, and I believe he did say so. If not, will he be pleased to state what he did say?

[Mr. BURGESS here said, I protest against any quotation, made by that gentleman, being considered as what I said.]

JAN. 23, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

[H. or R.]

Well, sir, in return for the gentleman's courtesy, I tell him that I care as little for his protest, as he can do for my quotations. From the beginning to the end of the declamatory harangue with which we have been entertained, the gentleman has gone on contradicting himself. He acknowledges that slaves are property, and then he argues to prove they cannot be property. He allows that property may be taken for the public use, and then goes on to argue that it can in no case be so taken, and, that no case of necessity has ever existed.

My object in rising, and in the few remarks I shall submit, was principally confined to the policy of adopting the amendment. We have been told that it would be very impolitic to adopt it, and that the precedent would be highly dangerous, if we shall thereby acknowledge that persons can be property. Now, on this precise point, of the policy of that measure, we are directly at issue. I say, that, to reject the amendment will be calculated to have a far worse consequence: it is calculated to make tories of patriotic citizens. If I prove this, I shall gain the object I had in view. I will put a case: suppose that, on the occasion of the recent attack on this Capitol by the British troops, a commander had been present who had sufficient foresight to anticipate such an attack, and to prevent its success by throwing up a breastwork, for the defence of this city; and for this purpose had issued an order to the slave-holders in the vicinity to furnish two thousand slaves to aid in that work. These orders, I say, would have amounted to an impressment of the slaves—but, according to the gentleman's doctrine, such a conjuncture would have presented no case of necessity to justify impressment. I ask if there is another gentleman on this floor, besides himself, who, if this step has been taken, and in consequence a dozen slaves had been killed by a shot from the enemy, would deny it to be fair, to be just, to be patriotic, to be honorable, that we compensate the owners for their loss? The salvation of this Capitol, and with it, of the character of the country, resulting from their employment, should we not pay for them if they fell! Now, take the opposite side—refuse to make payment—send forth your determination that you will never pay in such cases—that you do not consider such circumstances as presenting a case of necessity—and what will be the consequence? Should your Capitol ever be placed in such danger again, where is the farmer who will not feel it to be his policy rather to get his slaves out of the way of the Government? Nay, of rather sending them over to the enemy? For, according to the treaty of Ghent, they would then be paid for in the end. Sir, though I may be willing to risk my life for the defence of my country, I might not be willing to risk all that on which I must rely to save my wife and children from beggary. I say, therefore, that this doctrine is calculated to make tories rather than patriots. I agree that there is no law for impressment: but I hope our military officers will be left to act under their own discretion and responsibility, and that the People will decide whether there was or was not sufficient necessity to warrant their acts. There is our security—we may pay the individual for the loss of his property, but we hold the officer responsible. To me it is most clear, that policy, if nothing else, requires that we shall recognize the right of the master over his slave. By passing the amendment, we shall do this, provided the evidence of the facts is sufficient to establish the case. For myself, I am perfectly satisfied that it is sufficient—there is enough evidence to shew that the slave in this case was put in requisition under an order from the commanding General.

I am willing to admit, with the gentleman from Rhode Island, that those who think differently from me are divided into two classes—one of these includes persons, who, from the best feelings of the heart, do sincerely believe that a person cannot be property—and that it is cruel and unjust to treat them as such; and they cannot consider a man as walking humbly, doing justly, and loving mercy, who holds his fellow man in bondage. To a certain extent I agree with them in opinion; unless the holder of a slave believes it conscientiously to be his duty to hold him, he is worse than a pirate. But such as do, good as they are at heart, I would refer to the good advice of a good man in ancient times, "when I was a child, I thought as a child, I felt as a child; but now I put away childish things." There is another class, who admit that slaves are property; but hold that, as philanthropists and patriots, it is incumbent on them to make a timely provision to relieve the country of this evil, by opening a sewer and draining it off by a gradual process of colonization. These persons are willing to allow to slave holders all their just rights; I trust they will shew this on the present occasion, by voting for the amendment—let them shew their principles by their actions. I, Sir, am one of those plain men who desire to shew their faith by their works.

It has been contended by one gentleman that, although this slave is to be considered as the lawful property of the claimant, yet that he was property hired out on a contract. Sir, there is not a particle of evidence in the documents of any such thing. As gentlemen have made this assertion, let them show us the proof—the onus probandi is certainly on them: for the contrary is in evidence before us. Sir, D'Auterive would not have been entitled to one cent, if he had hired out this slave by his own voluntary act—he would, in that case, have been the insurer of his own servant; but can it be pretended that, under the Constitution, my property may be taken without my consent, and yet I am not to receive a just compensation for it? This slave was either taken by authority, or hired upon contract. If he was taken by authority, the officer who took him performed a patriotic act, and ought to be commended, and his owner ought to be paid for his loss or injury. It is not necessary to prove actual violence—a positive order from a Military Commander in authority is an impressment to all intents and purposes. If the impressment was not an act of necessity, let the officer be censured or punished; but surely the owner is still to be paid.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said, that, after all which had been said in this debate, it was very foreign from his purpose to fatigue the House with a set speech: he was not even disposed to notice some very extraordinary portions of the speech of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BROWN] who had just sat down, whose luxuriance of imagination had instructed some, and had entertained many who had heard him. In deprecating the evils of slavery, this gentleman had said, that it was to be regretted, that the decision of the Missouri Question had not, in effect, narrowed the spread of these evils. All this may be perfectly true; but the gentleman may give a domestic locality to his regrets: for it happens that the State he represents, small as it is, has done more to extend these evils, than any State in this Confederacy, in proportion to her numbers. If this argument was pushed to its ultimate consequences, and an injury to slaves in the public use was not to be indemnified, he [Mr. H.] presumed that every species of property, the result of slave labor, or purchased by the importation of slaves, would share the same fate. In which case, if property was destroyed in the public use by the hand of an enemy, in one of the most beautiful towns in the State from which the gentleman came, it ought not to be indemnified: for he believed that the town of Bristol had been, in a measure, built up, and owed a great portion of its prosperity to, the profits of the slave trade. He would not, however, discuss what might prove a thorny subject; he would, therefore, leave the gentleman in the undisturbed possession of the enjoyment which his eloquence was no doubt so well calculated to confer. I rose for another purpose—not to present to the House my poor thoughts, but to give them something infinitely more valuable. On referring to the Congressional Register of the second session of the Eighteenth Congress, I find that there was in that Congress a very distinguished gentleman, of the name of the honorable Mr. STORRS, of New York, at that time considered as remarkably and accurately conversant with municipal and international law. In the debate on the bill for compensating the inhabitants on the Niagara frontier, for the injury done to their property by the enemy, whilst in the public use, he held this language, and employed these conclusive arguments: "What, then, is the Government bound to do? To say to the individual so circumstanced—As you have rendered up your property for our use, we are your insurers: after you have placed yourself out of the protection of the law of nations, you shall not suffer by having done so? This, said Mr. S. is what I call a perfect obligation—a perfect moral obligation." [Here Mr. STORRS came and took his seat near that of Mr. H. Mr. HAMILTON said, that, although he could not "call spirits from the vasty deep," yet he was happy to find that his extracts were extracting something more tangible in size and shape.] This gentleman goes on to say: "The question for indemnity for losses sustained under such circumstances is a question not of charity but of absolute right; the whole of it turning on the principle, that the party has, for your use, exposed his property to destruction, lawfully, by the enemy. It is unjust, morally, that one who has thus surrendered up, and exposed to destruction his property, on account of the public, should himself suffer that loss thereby, which the public ought to bear. When you take the property of a citizen for public use, during war, you become the insurer of it against every act of the enemy—lawful or unlawful."

In another part of the debate, this gentleman holds this language: "Mr. STORRS maintained that this was not a proper point to be inquired into; the only point material, in the case was, whether a citizen, by surrendering his property to the use and occupation of his Government, had divested it of its private character: and whether, under such circumstances, it has been destroyed. If these two facts were shown, the Government, was bound to make up the loss; but the moment you go a step beyond this you meet an artificial difficulty of your own creating. Where private property, indeed, retaining its private character, becomes the subject of depredation by the enemy, as when the vessel of a merchant is unlawfully captured, or his goods wasted and destroyed, the case, though a hard one, gives no claim on the Government for indemnity. It comes under the general case of losses in war, and must be borne as it may. But as soon as he, by his voluntary act, gives up his property to the public use, it becomes as much an instrument of war as a cannon is. It is a part of the materiel of war, and the enemy may inflict upon it what injuries he will, lawful or unlawful: he may even destroy it in sport." This gentleman, at the close of the debate, goes on to say: "As to the objection of the act of 1816, [Mr. STORRS said,] it was one which he hardly knew in what way he ought to attempt to answer. The gentleman [Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia,] had been opposed to that act, as he had himself informed the House—and it could hardly be expected, therefore, that he should be in favor of the present bill. But, said Mr. S., let us see what he himself proposes respecting slaves. He would have the Government pay for all the slaves impressed during the last war, and afterwards lost. [Mr. FORSYTH explained, that he did not refer to all who were impressed but to all who were impressed lawfully.] As to the lawfulness of the acts of the officers of the Government being requisite before the Government will pay or make reparation for them, Mr. S. said there are precedents in abundance, on our statute books, which contradict such a doctrine." [Mr. RANDOLPH here inquired of Mr. HAMILTON whether Mr. STORRS or Mr. FORSYTH had made this declaration. Mr. HAMILTON said it was Mr. STORRS—and that it would seem, from the whole context of that gentleman's argument in the debate, that he had thought with Mr. FORSYTH, that the act of 1816 had not gone far enough.]

Mr. HAMILTON resumed. He would conclude the extracts he proposed reading, by exhibiting a somewhat different commentary and version, than those which have been recently presented, of the case of Major Austin. "Here Mr. STORRS referred to the case of indemnity to Major Austin, for damages obtained against him for acts done in the discharge of an official duty, and to several other cases. It had been the invariable practice of the American Government, he said, when any of its officers incurred responsibility in the honest discharge of what he believed to be his official duty by violating the private rights of the citizens, to indemnify him."

Mr. H. said, having fulfilled the purpose for which he rose, which was to offer an argument in favor of the claim which was better than any he could present of his own, he would no longer detain the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, he should occupy the attention of the House but a few moments, as he knew his patience was exhausted by this protracted debate. When this report was drawn and presented to the House, it was not in the contemplation of any one member of the committee that a discussion of two or three weeks would have been necessary to resist or explain any principle contained in it. The committee do not now perceive that this discussion has been called for by any thing contained in the report. Gentlemen have sought for matter in the resources of their own imaginations, whereon to base their arguments, and have, in some instances, lost sight of the report altogether. The gentlemen who have advocated the amendment, with the exception of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DORSEY] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER] have assumed, as the basis of their argument, that the Committee have denied that slaves are property. There is nothing in the report which will justify this assumption. The gentlemen who first spoke in favor of the amendment, could not have read the report with attention; if they had, Mr. W. said, he was confident that they would have come to a very different conclusion from the one they seemed now to have arrived at. He said the committee had some right to complain of the liberty which some gentleman had taken, to read part of a sentence, and then triumphantly to ask if the committee had not stated that slaves were not property? The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KEAR] read thus far, "as slaves have not been put on the footing of property," when if he had read the sentence through, he would have perceived that the position of the committee is, that slaves are property, but not paid for when lost to the owner in the public service. The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] thinks he is warranted in saying that the Committee do not believe that slaves are property, from the circumstance that they have not made use of the term "slave," but have substituted that of "servant." This is about as reasonable a conclusion as any that has been drawn, but it so happens in this case, that the claimant has not made use of the term "slave," and if the conclusion be correct, as to the committee, it must also be correct as to the claimant, and then he does not believe slaves to be property, or, as this property can be described by no other term than that of slave, then the claimant has not had his property injured while in the service, and presents no good claim for indemnity.

JAN. 23, 1828.]

Case of Marigny D'Autorise.

[H. OF R.]

If gentlemen will take up the report and read it dispassionately, they will find that the committee do consider that slaves are property, but of that kind, which, heretofore, it has not been deemed to be the policy of the Government to pay for. In support of this principle, the committee have referred to several precedents, which they considered applicable; gentlemen, however, have thought otherwise, in all the cases, except that of Purkill; and for this reason, that in all of the other cases, the slaves were taken into the service by the consent of the master. The committee state a negative fact; and if it can be disproved, it is for those who wish to adopt a new principle to bring forward their precedents, and prove that the committee are incorrect. We say slaves have not been paid for when lost or injured in the service; if they have been, we have overlooked the cases, and it is incumbent on the gentlemen to produce them. We believe that no such case exists; and, if it does not, the committee should have been spared the imputation of having introduced here a proposition calculated to excite heat and ill nature. If the dissolution of the Union shall be consequent to the investigation of this case, the fault will be elsewhere than with the committee. They searched through all the reports and found no case, nor the recognition of any principle which would justify them in submitting a proposition to grant relief; and they now ask of the House calmly to reflect, and look to the consequences which must follow, if the amendment is adopted. Slaves will be liable to be impressed into the service, and the condition of both master and slave will be comparatively perilous. Gentlemen have said, that they will not consent to have arms put into the hands of their slaves, but that they are willing, in times of great danger, that their slaves should be put into the trenches. They say they are peculiarly adapted to this kind of employment, and that they are willing they should be put to that servitude which will increase the physical strength of the country in time of invasion. If the principle is once admitted, that slaves may be impressed, what guarantee has the master that arms will not be put into their hands? And if they are to be put to the employment to which they are adapted, may they not as well man the lines as the trenches? I was not aware that the slave's pillow was that of thorns, or that the master's midnight slumbers were disturbed by his apprehensions of being assassinated, as has been so feelingly depicted by the gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. DRAYTON.]

The committee took for their guide, in drawing the report, the law of April 9th, 1816. Some gentlemen say, that the case is brought within the provisions of that law, and within either the 3d or 5th sections of it. Mr. W. said he thought a moment's examination would satisfy them of their error, and he would endeavor to shew that it was not embraced by either of the sections. He said, that two rules for construing statutes should be borne in mind; the first was, that "a statute which treats of things or persons of an inferior rank cannot, by any general words, be extended those of a superior." The second rule was, that "one part of a statute must be so construed by another, that the whole may, if possible, stand."

He said that that part of the third section which it was necessary for him to cite, was, "That any person who, in the late war, aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss, capture, or destruction, by an enemy, of any horse, mule, or wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, while such property, was in the military service of the United States, either by impressment or contract," &c. Applying the rule referred to, to this section, and all animals, and all vehicles not enumerated, are excluded, and the case now before us is not within the purview of the section.

The 5th section is, "That, where any property has been impressed, or taken by public authority, for the use or subsistence of the army during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof, deducting therefrom the amount which has been paid, or may be claimed, for the use and risk of the same, while in the service aforesaid."

This section includes all articles for the use and subsistence of the Army, and under it may be included, all materials for building huts, barracks, fortifications, and camp equipage. It embraces the first item in the account, and those cases referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. MITCHELL.] Under the term subsistence, is included all eatables and drinkables necessary for provisioning the Army; but no one has ever supposed until now, that a slave was included in either of the sections. If there is no restriction by the provisions of the third section, the two sections cannot be reconciled, and both of them cannot stand; and, if the construction which has been given to the fifth section be correct, there was no necessity of enacting the third section.

The Committee could have had no other motive in making a decision in this case, than what governs them in all cases—an ardent desire to discharge their duty faithfully, according to the principles established by the law of 1816, and the uniform decisions of the House. We believed the claimant by these principles and decisions to be without a remedy, and proposed that the same provision should be made for his relief, that is adopted in the case of a militia-man who is wounded in the service; and this recommendation is arraigned against us, as proof that we did not believe slaves were property. The Committee did think that the slaveholders would be willing, if their slaves had been injured in the public service, to receive a compensation equal to what is given to a militia-man; but if it is the pleasure of the House to adopt a new principle and pay for slaves it ought to require the same proof in support of this claim that it has in other cases. In all instances where other property has been impressed, it has been the practice to require that a copy of the order be produced, authorizing the impressment, if an order issued, and if not, that there was a necessity for the article taken, and this fact to be proven by the Commanding Officer. If the Commanding Officer was in the service at the time of giving his certificate, it has been received without oath; but if not, his oath is as necessary as that of any person who appears as a witness. In this case, notwithstanding the respect the Committee entertained for the character of Gen. Carroll, they required that his statement, in relation to the first item of the account, should be sworn to, before they would receive it as evidence. If this slave is to be paid for, we hope the wholesome rules which have been adopted in other cases, and necessarily so to prevent fraud and imposition, will not now be violated. If the testimony is examined, it will be found, that there is no proof that the slave ever was impressed. The Commanding General directed the Mayor of New Orleans to hold in requisition a certain number of hands. This order was transmitted to the Syndic of the Parish; but whether the men furnished was by impressment or contract, is not proven by the papers. The same mode was observed in different parts of the country, in relation to the transportation of baggage and the munitions of war. Impressment was unnecessary, except in a few instances; it was only necessary to know that the Commanding General needed further aid, and it was furnished without compulsion. If the House require the same proof in this case which it uniformly has done in other cases, the amendment cannot prevail; but if it should not, all the established principles are overruled, and a new era in the settlement of claims will commence.

Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair. It is not merely the motion by the cry of question, that this House is now prepared and anxious to decide the question so long under debate, that will prevent me from detaining the House; nor will my friends, nor any member of this House, after what I have already said and done, believe that I desire further delay. Nor, Sir, should I now have claimed one moment of your time, but for the remarks of the member from Ohio, who is represented to have attributed to me opinions in relation to this question, by far less liberal than those he had just given us. I therefore call upon that gentleman to correct an error, if it be one, which arraigns my opinion as a member of that Committee to which he now belongs, against the opinion I have advanced in this debate. Sir, he has admitted property in slaves, and he is reported as having said, on a former occasion, that "I did not consider a slave property in the abstract." Sir, this is an opinion I never entertained, nor expressed in Committee nor elsewhere, nor could I have dreamed that, at this day, I should have found it due to myself to remove a shadow of doubt in relation to it; for it must be remembered, that, in consequence of having been a member of that Committee on a former occasion, I had to bear rather a prominent part in the defence of the rights of the South; and my opinions upon this branch of such rights, in another case not to be forgotten by the members of the last Congress, [Larche's case.] I therefore expect and call upon the member from Ohio to make the proper correction.

[Mr. WHITTLESEY replied, that he had never said, here or elsewhere, that the gentleman from Alabama had entertained or expressed such an opinion. He would certainly have done him injustice if he had so represented him.]

Mr. OWEN resumed. My main object is attained Sir, I did not believe it possible that such opinions could have been by him ascribed to me, though such is the report. But the explanation is full and satisfactory; had it been otherwise, I should have been at some loss to know how such opinion could have been called out, when the main object of the defenders of the report of the Committee, is to show that no such point is raised in it. Be that as it may—I will certainly now be pardoned for adding, that I am gratified that this question has undergone a full discussion; and, so far from my having regrets at the course I invited the House to pursue, we have but little to complain of, and much to congratulate ourselves on in the course of the debate—I cannot say perfectly fairly conducted in every respect, but, so far as our main question, I mean Southern interest, depended, we have had from all quarters a full and frank avowal of property in slaves, and of its inviolable character, and more especially, that this Government can never disturb that question. Some of my friends have expressed to me regret that I called for, and urged this investigation, and some who have opposed me have also regretted it. But, for myself, I must be permitted to say, that I have no regret. And my first ground is the more clearly sustained by this very debate, that if there was an unsettled question of great magnitude, the greater was the necessity for deliberation and prompt decision; and, Sir, although it is not my purpose to add any thing more in this already too protracted discussion, I must be permitted to remark that the range of the debate has been much more copious, and taken a latitude much wider, than I anticipated. Still, Sir, I do not regret it, even though it has embraced within its scope all things connected with the subject matter, and almost all things that are not connected with it, from the "opinion written" of one gentleman, to the splendid picture exhibited by another of "military despotism," of "military usurpation;" and, Sir, I will add, that if this picture was intended for effect, I regret that the same gentleman had not again brought to our view, as he did in most glowing colors to the members of the 18th Congress, his picture, presented in his usual style, always eloquent, of "civil corruption," of "ministerial influence" in elections by the People; if this had been given us, they both might have gone to the people together. But as the latter, in every age, has preceded the other, it is right to preserve the chronological order in which he has presented them. My allusion is to the debate on the contested election from the "Norfolk District, Massachusetts," in the 18th Congress. I have done. I hope the question will be correctly decided.

Mr. GURLEY said, his only object in rising, was to correct some of the errors, into which gentlemen on the opposite side had fallen. He should enter into no general discussion of the question. Different gentlemen had opposed the amendment on different grounds. A gentleman from New York [Mr. S. WOODS] said, in his remarks to the House, that if we could produce the verdict of a jury as to the amount of the damages sustained, he would consent to indemnify the claimant to that extent. We have produced much more than a verdict [said Mr. GURLEY]—we have produced the evidence on which a verdict ought to rest. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN] acknowledges that persons are property, under the municipal laws of a state; but, as soon as they are removed beyond the limits of the state, they cease to be property, coming then under what he called the imperial or universal law; and in support of his position, referred to that provision of the constitution which requires that slaves, when passing into the free States, shall, on application of the masters, be delivered up. Sir, this is precisely the proof to which I would refer on the other side. Why does the constitution say they shall be restored? For a reason exactly the reverse of that given by the gentleman;—because the general government will not weaken the tenure by which that property is held. The next objection started is, that if you adopt this principle, great public injury must follow. Instead of meeting the principle itself, this objection would frighten us with the consequences! If, say gentlemen, we pay for slaves killed or injured in battle, you must, on the same principle, pay in like manner for minors and apprentices. Well, Sir, suppose we must;—if the principle is a sound one, where is the objection? Let us pay. I am ready to go the whole extent of the principle, let its application be ever so extensive. But, Sir, where did Congress get the power to call out minors? They derive it from the constitution, which gives them power to organize the militia; but the constitution was formed by the free citizens of these States for themselves and their descendants forever. But do militia mean slaves? Enlistment is a contract. Can a slave be a party to a contract with the Government? Surely not, Sir, and where then is the analogy? The constitution gives the Congress certain powers to be exercised upon those, who gave them. But slaves never conferred a particle of that power.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] says, that by admitting three fifths of the slaves into the ratio of representation, you increase the power of their masters. Granted. But if at the framing of the constitution, it had been agreed that three fifths of the sheep of a northern agriculturist should be reckoned in the ratio, must not the bargain be maintained? And does it alter the case in the least, whether the compact was to reckon slaves or sheep? The gentleman also says that this slave was taken by contract; where is the evidence? The evidence is that this slave, cart and horse were, together with others, put in requisition by the Commander in chief. The translation of the original French word is impressed." No consent of the master can be shewn. ut, supposing there was a contract ;—if I loan my property at a certain rate of compensation ; and it afterwards turns out that the person, who hired it, put it to uses more hazardous than were known or contemplated, r than belongs to the proper use of that species of property, is he not bound to make good any loss which ay have accrued in consequence ? If, however, the gentleman from Rhode Island will produce a contract, will agree to withdraw the amendment.

In cases of hire, the owner becomes his own insurer, nd charges according to the risk to be run ; but there as no hiring in this case. The public took the slave ; he public had the use of him ; the owner was deprived f his services, and in a great measure of his value ; and he question is, shall the public remunerate him. This property was taken not only without the consent, but in he absence of the owner, who was at the lines fighting he enemy of his country ; an officer is sent and the property taken into the public service. He afterwards finds ut the names of the respective owners and gives them ertificates of the fact. Is this no impressment ? Is not he government bound to pay ? Yes surely ; as much is if a file of soldiers had advanced and seized them at he point of the bayonet. But the gentleman from Rhode Island employed an argument of a different kind—an argument addressed to our pride and patriotism. He says t is impossible that a necessity could have existed that ould justify the impressment ; that at such an hour even oulds would flock to their country's standard. Sir, permit me to tell that gentleman, that no cowards, but hat brave men flocked to the defence of their country on that occasion ; that not a part but all her citizens were forward to press into her ranks. There was but one feeling, one soul, one ambition, and that was who should do the most—who should offer himself and his property with the readiest devotion. But, Sir, it will be a poor consolation to Marigny D'Auterive, to tell him that a certain gentleman from Rhode Island, paid a very eloquent compliment to his patriotism and bravery ; but utterly refused to pay him for his property. Sir, that gentleman's compliments will not restore to this injured slave the use of his eye, nor the strength of his arm. No, Sir, there was no sculking on that occasion : all went to the rampart and the field ;—the contest was who should get there first, or stay longest, till the beaten enemy retreated. The glories of that day were not achieved by ignoble and cowardly hands. The battle of New Orleans was fought by the yeomanry of the country, who in peace cultivate the soil, and in war defend it.

Another gentleman says, you pay for property lost, but in no case for property injured. Sir, look to what was done in the case of the claimants for the reparation of losses on the Niagara frontier. Did you pay for no injured property there? Yes, Sir, you paid those claims in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. But the moment we bring you an injured negro, you say no ! the government never have paid for slaves. Well, Sir, is that any reason they never shall ?—that they never ought ? But then, you must pay for minors ! Sir, when that case arises, I will decide upon it ; it is not before us now. None doubt that this slave was taken ; he was taken by the government ; wounded in their service ; and in all justice we ought to pay for the injury sustained under such circumstances.

The question on the amendment moved by Mr. GUNTER was now about to be put, when

Mr. WOODS, of Ohio, demanded that it be taken by Yeas and Nays. They were ordered by the House, and being taken, stood as follows :

RETRENCHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CHILTON on the 21st January.

Mr. CHILTON said, that he disliked, in a second instance, to refer to the same subject which had already been discussed, and to consume even a small portion of the time of the House ; but the duty which he owed to his constituents, and to himself, compelled him to offer a few remarks in reply to what had been said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BARNER]—because, said he, that gentleman has made me the subject of a passing notice. He seemed to consider me a bird of flight, and treated me accordingly. The gentleman amused himself for a considerable time with a recitation of a portion of poetry, which he seemed to repeat with much pleasure; whether he amused the House or not, I shall not undertake to decide. I have been taught to believe that age and youth are, in some respects, subject to the same exception—superannuation in the one case producing the same effect as imbecility in the other. The same remark may, perhaps, be applied to the statements of that honorable gentleman and myself. He seemed to insinuate that, as I had attended here only a few days, ergo, or therefore, it was arrogant in me to bring the solitary and insulated interest of my constituents before Congress. The gentleman might perhaps, have convinced himself, as he came very near to convince me, that my proper course would be to return home, and commit the interests of myself and my constituents to his care. The gentleman's age and experience certainly entitle him to great regard; and I had thought that, while the hoary hairs of age were entitled to respect, from superannuation, the weakness and inexperience of youth might be entitled to some small portion of his Christian charity. I had never understood that, on the floor of this Hall, the privileges of members were, in any respect, different from each other. The aged here I certainly venerate, and am even prepared to fall at their feet, and receive the lessons of instruction, if, by so doing, I could in the least advance the cause of my country and of my constituents. It has been said, however, that the aged ought to remember that they once were young, while the young ought not to forget that they one day may be old. Youth, from its ardour and eagerness, may indeed, sometimes go beyond what duty requires; but let the aged also remember, that they cannot arrogate all the rights to themselves. Why was I sent here by my constituents? Was it to sit in silence when their rights were involved? When, on rising, I was honored with at least the partial attention of the House, had I sat silent I should have failed in redeeming those pledges which I gave to my constituents. I represent a portion of the People of these United States; and the only difference which ought to exist here, between the old and the young, is in the different degrees of their devotion to the cause of Republicanism. The gentleman ought to remember that an old Representative is sometimes superseded by a young one, who, when he makes his first debut, is sometimes found to be better qualified than his predecessor. Admonition from the aged shall always be received by me, in kindness and with thanks, when it is not carried so far that, in complying with it, I must neglect my duty. When it goes to this length, I shall take my own course. I am well aware that I have attacked an important and dangerous subject. Why? Because I have brought the matter at once to the threshold. Such was my design. I resolved to attack extravagance, whether it should be found in this Hall, or in any of the Departments of Government. I am informed, by friends of great respectability, that many have been deterred from advocating the cause of retrenchment, by an apprehension that they should be considered as possessing a niggardly spirit, and accused of great tamerity, if they should venture to say that matters here do not go on quite right. I am willing to encounter such imputations, and am prepared to fall a victim under them. My country is more to me than the good opinion of any body of men. Duty to my constituents shall always be my polar star. I have not, therefore, hesitated to attack a system of profusion, however formidable. My fate is with the House, with the community, with my God, and my constituents.

I trust I need say nothing more on the high standing and experience of the gentleman from Maryland, nor on his rhymes. I will not say they were tolerable, but I will say they were like the breeze—they passed off. I must confess I did not derive from them much light on the subject of retrenchment. I acknowledge they might have done for trimmings, but not for the substance of any thing. The gentleman in the next place attacks the policy of my argument, in relation to the pay of our noble selves, as he called us. I know that, when I approach a great many of the members of this House, I touch a very tender point. Sir, the British Parliament has been referred to. God forbid that they should be my text book—the Lord defend us against the British parliament, and all things connected with the British Government. It was against it that we revolted, and it shall never be my model, for finance, or for any thing else; unless gentlemen want to see here a sinking fund and debt like that of Great Britain. Another point in the gentleman's remarks, was this, that our present pay is not extravagant, because gentlemen wish to have their wives and children, and servants, and I suppose many others attending here with them; because, when once you begin, there is no stopping place. All the members, however, are not so happily situated—whether the possibility might be extended to all, by sufficiently squandering the public money, I cannot say; but one thing I will say to the gentleman, that, if he is not happy here without his family, he may be happy with them at home. There is, I presume, no compulsory process, which obliges him to attend here; and though his seat may not be so ably filled, yet I doubt not that his district will continue to be represented, even if he shall magnanimously decline coming again to Congress without his family. His use of his pay is a little more surprising, and somewhat amusing. How is it expended? for as I understood the gentleman, none of it is treasured up—it is expended, it seems, in liberal donations to charitable objects; this, with me, is a strong reason why I would not give it to them. There are divers ways and means of converting the public Treasury into a machine to promote our private purposes. A contingent fund furnishes a tremendous machine for pulling down our republican institutions. The pay of a member of Congress, and his franking privileges, may easily be made vehicles by which documents calculated to advance one party and pull down another, may be conveyed from time to time, and from place to place. The object, in each case, is to advance himself. Building temples, at the expence of the Government, is certainly a very laudable employment. I justify my venerable friend for such an application of his pay. I am even proud to think that it is applied to the erection of temples, and I hope humbly that he is a worshipper therein. Yet I consider it of great importance that our wages should be reduced. We could not then bring our families with us, it is true, but at present we certainly receive more than is necessary to support ourselves decently. We pay for our board from $10 to $15 a week. Our pay amounts to $36 a week. What becomes of the balance? Sir, I would not convert this Hall into a set of exchange rooms, into an office for money changers. I would rather imitate the illustrious example which has been set us, and turn over the tables of the money-changers. To do so, would, in my opinion, evince devotion to our country. But if many must sit here as mere blanks, they would certainly be better at home. We should either determine at once to cover all the expenses of the trip, or else to reduce our wages to such a sum as will enable any gentleman to keep his seat here. And for this purpose, six dollars a day is, in my opinion, amply sufficient.

The gentleman, in one part of his speech also alluded to the school at West Point, and he seems to glory in the prospect of that Institution. It seems he has been there, and seen the effects of the system. But I, sir oppose that school for the best of all reasons. Its benefits are given to the rich and the well-born. Few, if any, of the poor, receive any benefit from it. It is possible they may share in more of them when the system is extended. In peace, its advantages are certainly inconsiderable, if, indeed, it has any at all. The poor man can't spare his child. He cultivates the soil, and many families subsist entirely on the industry of their sons. These, therefore, are detained at home, and are taxed for an institution of this kind. In these remarks, I do not allude to any purpose of discontinuing the institution; but I would certainly avoid all supernumeraries.

Retrenchment.

The calculation of the gentleman on the subject of the public lands is certainly very peculiar. His opinion and mine differ very widely. But the difference will be adjusted by time. I still hold the position that much of our public revenue is derived from the public lands—we all know this—and I repeat it, if we merely wade now, what must be our condition when this source of revenue is exhausted? The gentleman, indeed, has told us, that we shall have abundance of these lands on hand two hundred years hence. But this is a mere chimera. If the House will but for one moment investigate the immense expense which these lands cost to the Government, they cannot fail to see that it would be much better if the whole were given away. An annual appropriation is called for—yes, sir, and an annual appropriation is made—ininitely more than that derived from the sale of the lands. Hence gentlemen are greatly mistaken, if they consider the public lands as an eternal source of revenue. And if the present system in relation to them shall be persevered in, the Government, ere long, will discover that they have passed a bourne from which they cannot return.

I need not advert, for any great length of time, to the gentlemen's systematic plan of electioneering, or to those horses which he called poney, and which he told us were so trained as of themselves to approach every man's door. No doubt they did so to carry some point of aspirants to office. But this I consider wholly aside from the merits of the question.

The gentleman also proposed, if I would agree with him, to receive no pay whatever for his services, and allow the whole of his wages to go towards the discharge of the public debt. That gentleman may be able, from his circumstances, to do this, but if made a general rule, it would operate very unequally. If, however, the gentleman will satisfy me that his pecuniary circumstances are the same as mine, I pledge myself to go hand in hand with him, and am willing to measure patriotism with him by his own scale. A remark fell from my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] in relation to the Fifth Auditor. In justice to that officer, I must be permitted to say, that he was not designed to be the object of the operation of the inquiry proposed. I did not design any individual in particular. They are all unknown to me, as I to them. But I still believe that there are more Auditors than necessary. I believe there are some that might safely be dispensed with. As an exception, however, I name with pride and pleasure the Third and Fifth Auditors, and the Postmaster General. These officers, I believe to be prompt in the discharge of their duty. I do not say that all others are not so; but I believe that some might, with advantage, be discontinued. A sound discretion must be exercised in this matter. I wish the House, however, distinctly to understand, that the Fifth Auditor is not designed by me to be discontinued. But as I believe that there are too many Auditors, I care not which of them, in point of numerical succession, shall be stricken from the list.

The gentleman further remarked, that I should have investigated this subject myself, and not have turned over the task to others. But, Sir, it is impossible that I should wade through all the intricacies of this subject. I am clothed with no power to approach an individual or an office. Information, if given to me, is a matter of courtesy. But when a Committee of this House shall be invested with authority, the doors must open, the papers must be exhibited, and this is my object.

The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] has recommended a division of the resolution, and the reference of its several parts to different Committees of the House. Sir, I am perfectly content that this honorable body shall dispose of the resolution just as it shall please. My pledge is redeemed. I could redeem it by no other means. I have done my duty by submitting the resolution, and if that gentleman shall offer any plan for dividing or subdividing it, I assure him I shall not take it unkindly; on the contrary, I will go hand in hand with that gentleman, in any arrangement he may propose. I would only observe, that, if we begin to fritter away the resolution, I fear the object of it will never be accomplished. If it shall be thought best to refer the resolution to a Select Committee, I shall be entirely satisfied. The evil is a crying evil; I have no doubt of its existence; and I want to know how the contingent fund is appropriated. I will therefore suggest a modification of the resolution.

Mr. C. then modified the second resolution, by introducing, after the words "with instruction," the words "to inquire into and," so as to make it read;

"That the foregoing resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to inquire into and report," &c.

This modification is designed solely to accommodate the wishes of the House. I have not the slightest wish to embarrass any gentleman on the floor. All I wish is an inquiry; when that is made I shall be content. I can then return to my constituents, and say to them whether the impression I had on this subject is true or false. Any proposition of gentlemen, with a view to this object, will be taken kindly by me. I have no right or power to dictate to this House. I am positive only on one thing, and that is, that we shall resort to a system of retrenchment.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, when the gentleman from S. Carolina withdrew his motion yesterday, to lay this resolution on the table, I rose for the purpose of renewing it. But, understanding that he had not withdrawn it, I did not because I could not renew it. The gentleman from South Carolina, with that courtesy and comity which we all ought to shew to one another, did, subsequently, withdraw his motion, in order to give an opportunity to the gentleman who moved it, and who has now just taken his seat, to make explanations. That opportunity having been ample, I should be content to let the matter pass, but that I feel myself pledged (to use an expression which, though parliamentary, is not strictly grammatical) to the cause of retrenchment. I shall say a few, a very few words, in order to explain the course I am about to take, and which, otherwise, might appear to militate against that cause. Sir, I do believe, that retrenchment is required, both by the circumstances of the country, and by the voice of the public. I concur heartily with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on my left, [Mr. BUCHANAN] in all he advanced, (in as far as that went.) I am clearly of opinion that this is a case in which reformation, like charity, (I mean modern charity) begins at home—at least it ought to begin at home. I have long been of opinion, that no economical Government could ever inhabit such a House as this; I do believe we never shall have an economical Government in such an establishment as the present. This, however, may be a peculiar opinion of mine. Yes, sir, reformation must begin at home. I do not mean in our own cases as members—I am not going to start the per diem question—God forbid! We had enough of that when we sat in the brick building, over the way, (where I should be very glad we sat now.) I believe sir, that whatever abuses may exist elsewhere, we can go with them, pari passu, at home, and shew an equal case of abuse. But, sir, this is not "the accepted time"—and in saying this, I do not speak in the words of some of the orators over the water, who never will find an "accepted time" for parliamentary or economical reform. Every effort that is made now, will only recoil on those who make it—will injure the cause, not further it. One of the greatest men and best patriots that ever lived, I mean John De Witt, when asked how he managed to get through so much business, replied, that he managed it "by doing one thing at a time." Now, sir, I believe that we have "one thing needful" to do, and I am for doing it. I will not indicate further than I have done, what that "one thing" is. I say, let us bring to bear upon that object the whole of our strength, all our rays, light and heat, into one focus. Sir, we know that even Mr. Jefferson, in his highest and most palmy state, could not succeed in certain reforms he wished to introduce. And why, sir? Because there was a countervailing under-current, too strong even for him to stem.

Mr. Speaker, I wish not to add another to the number of resolutions which are to be taken up regularly every morning—debated for an hour throughout the session, and, at the end of it, left unfinished, with the unfinished speech of some gentleman by the side of them; and this resolution will infallibly take that course, unless you revise your rules and orders, or unless the House will join me in a motion I am going to make. Sir, I will not enter upon one of the subjects referred to in the resolution, farther than to say one word in respect to the school at West Point. Sir, that School is a contrivance to educate the sons of the rich at the expense of the poor. But I will not, by farther entering into this subject, bring all that force to operate against me, which I know to be enlisted in defence of that Institution. I am for doing one thing at a time—but it is nevertheless true, that every poor man in this country who buys a pound of sugar, a peck of salt, or as much iron as will point his plough share, can proudly say to any one of the cadets from West Point, "you were educated at my expense." Yes, sir, he can say this, and how would the young man feel under such circumstances? Certainly as I would not feel for any consideration that can be named.

I had rather that a son of mine should be obliged to make his mark, for want of knowing how to write, than that, while his father was capable of bearing all the necessary charges, he should be educated at the public expense. Sir, I make no reflections: for the only man I ever knew, who was educated under such circumstances, is as estimable, as worthy, and as true a man as any that lives. I never knew but one. Sir, it is just as easy, that two bodies should occupy the same space, as that all these irons should be in the fire at the same time, and none of them should burn. As long as we have this dead weight against us, reformation is impossible. I defy the committees to accomplish any thing—you may turn them all into the Departments and they will do nothing; and when I say this, do I mean to cast any personal reflections? Certainly not—not at all sir—I have already said that Mr. Jefferson, even in his highest and most palmy state, was baffled in the attempt. Sir, there are certain interests here which were too strong for him—they are stronger than the President, and stronger than the People. I now move you that this resolution lie upon the table, never to be taken up again, with my consent, during the present session.

The question now being about to be put on laying the resolution on the table, Mr. CULPEPER demanded that it be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDOLPH now offered to withdraw the motion, if the gentleman from North Carolina wished to submit any remarks to the House.

Mr. CULPEPER declining to do so,

Mr. ARMSTRONG asked for the reading of the resolution as modified. It having been read, accordingly, Mr. HOFFMAN asked that the propositions in the resolution might be separated, so that a vote might be taken on laying on the table each by itself.

The SPEAKER pronounced this not to be in order; and, thereupon,

The question was taken by yeas and nays, on the whole resolution, and decided in the negative—Yeas 47—Nays 149.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the following amendment:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into and report to this House what officers, in their opinion, may be most advantageously discontinued, what salaries will reasonably bear reduction, and such other means of retrenchment as to them may seem necessary."

The SPEAKER now announced that the hour allotted to the consideration of resolutions had expired, when

Mr. STEWART moved to postpone the orders of the day for the purpose of continuing, and, if possible, ending, the present discussion.

The motion prevailed, Yeas 84, Nays 82.

The resolution, as modified having been again read—

Mr. CULPEPER said he should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from New York, because it does not go to the full extent, if any reform be necessary; but he should vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, with the hope that he would not stop at, or be content with the reference to a committee, but pursue it to some practical result. And I will pledge myself (said Mr. C.) to go with the gentleman the full length. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we should begin with a reduction of our own compensation, I do not agree with him. He says that the per diem allowance to members is too low to compensate for our loss of time, though more than sufficient for our support while here. Sir, (said Mr. C.) I have not patriotism enough to devote my time to the public for a bare support. My family are to be provided for, and I shall vote for the compensation I deem just, and use my wages to support myself, to pay my debts, to support my family, &c. just as I would the avails of my labor on my farm, or any where else: and I deem eight dollars about a proper compensation, and I shall never vote for less, for fear that that compensation may end the 3d March, &c. But the gentleman expresses a hope that we have passed the middle of the session. Passed the middle of the session! And what have we done? We have passed one bill to appropriate money to pay our own salaries; and if we are to progress in the same way, judging of our progress in future from the past, we shall pass one more bill; and what bill is that to be? Not the tariff, I presume: for, though many gentlemen are anxious for the passage of that bill, yet the resolution authorizing the committee to send for persons, &c. has I expect, put the passage of that bill out of dispute, if we are to rise the 3d of March. Yes, sir, the bill on that subject, if not defunct, is rocked to sleep for the present, if we are to have a short session. Before I sit down, I will suggest to the gentleman, if he desires reform, to amend his resolution, and refer the subject of it to a select committee, and not to the Committee of Ways and Means, when the committee has informed us and no doubt honestly, that they cannot have time to make the inquiry. Send it sir, to a select committee—let the subject be fully investigated, and I will go all lengths with the gentleman in his progress towards reform and retrenchment, if any shall be proved to be necessary.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, as this thing is to be gone into, so far from having reached the middle of the Session, I fear we have only begun it. I had hoped that, instead of [N. 24, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

ing half way, we were two-thirds through it. I do not know what more the public good imperiously requires, that is now attainable, than that we should pass the other appropriation bills, and then adjourn. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] but I shall not, therefore, vote in favor of the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON.] I cannot agree in sending the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means; and one reason is, that the Chairman of that committee has very truly told us, that he would be sent, without chart or compass, upon a voyage of discovery, to find out terra incognita; but, if adopted, I will join in sending it to a Select Committee, knowing, from what has passed, now that Committee will be appointed—I should not say knowing, but rather, being able to anticipate, from the usage of the House in all such cases. If this subject is to be brought up, I hope it will be thoroughly probed; and the only way thoroughly to probe it, will be, to have the discussion, first, here, on the general principle of reform. Let gentlemen here—in this House—determine whether they will retrench, and then point out what offices can be spared, and what salaries can be reduced. Sir, any movement at this time, affecting great interests and classes of men, was what I deprecated when my very worthy and most respectable colleague [Mr. P. P. BARBORN] brought in his resolution on the subject of the Government Stock in the Bank of the United States; and, which, although the House refused to put upon the table, finally obtained but nine votes in its favor. I do not hesitate to say, here in my place, that the expenses of this Government are too high, that they ought to be reduced, and that, as soon as such a thing is practicable, I am ready to join heart and hand in its accomplishment. Sir, I will specify one or two particulars. The present salary of the President of the United States, and I hope no gentleman will understand me as wishing to have it increased, has remained where it now is ever since it was appointed, hard upon forty years ago. What other salary under this Government is in the same situation? Is there one other? When, by the improvidence, imprudent conduct, of the men who were at the head of the Treasury, and of the Councils of this House, under their auspices, the whole country was deluged with paper money—when the people of the United States were brought to this pass, that their trustees exchanged their notes, bottomed upon every foot of land and upon every shilling's worth of productive labor of the country, against the notes of certain corporations; yes, exchanged their own notes, bearing interest, for the notes of those corporations, bearing no interest—when they agreed to allow a bonus on the nominal amount of these bank notes, equal to nearly twenty, certainly exceeding ten per cent.—when tobacco was worth forty dollars per hundred, for choice crops—when cotton was worth thirty dollars; and for a single slave, a common field hand, were paid, to my certain knowledge, twelve hundred dollars—when land was at a price which beggars all belief, (if that price had not been paid in worthless trash, for the land was, in fact cheaper than it is now)—then, sir, the salaries of all the officers of this Government were raised. I will point to one, (absit invidia) that of the Attorney General. It commenced, I believe, with $1,200, because it was considered that the very office itself was a great remuneration. Since then it has been raised, I know not how often. So, all the salaries have been increased. Sir, have any been diminished? I believe not one—not one to my knowledge. It is easy to talk about “a certain style of living,” and about the dignity which becomes the officers of this Government. Sir, we may swell like the poor frog in the fable, till we burst, but we cannot equal the style or splendor of those on the other side of the water. And we never shall be able to equal them, until our people shall be reduced to the same state of misery with their people. Dignity consists in adapting the style of our living to the means we have to live on. It never did consist in expense and pageantry, especially in a Government having even the semblance of Republicanism. Dignity, like happiness, resides in the mind—it is in the man, and you cannot give it by any station. Sir, there was as much true dignity in Fabricius—there is now as much true dignity in Fabricius, as there ever was in Louis XIV.—the grande monarque, who was never seen, even by his valet de chambre, without the paraphernalia of his enormous wig—in comptis Curium capillis; yes, sir there was as much dignity in the American Curius Dentatus, I mean Roger Sherman, as in any of the Ambassadors which his most Christian Majesty thought fit to send to us, then his very great, dear allies.

Sir, whenever money is plenty, and every thing is at the highest price, that price forms a very good reason why salaries must be raised. And when all things have fallen, and the price is depreciated, for aught I know 90 per cent, why then, sir, the times are so hard that salaries cannot be reduced, but, on the contrary, should be raised. So, in reference to the emolument of Government, that happens which happens in certain other institutions, where the Directors, the Cashiers, and the Presidents, take good care of themselves, but are quite regardless of the Stockholders. Sir, in this Government, the People are the Stockholders, and all I look at, in any public man, is, whether he is for the Stockholders, or for the Directors. This is my test, my touchstone. Yes, sir, when all things are dear, salaries must be raised, because they are dear; when all things are cheap, still salaries must be raised, because the cheapness of every thing shews the scarcity of money, and that the times are hard. So, sir, to use one of my homely phrases, and that language is understood by the People, and is the only language I will ever use when speaking to them—the game amounts to this: Cross, the People lose; and Pile, their rulers win. Sir, I wish to know, if the offices of this Government were filled with less able men, when Jefferson was in the Department of State, Hamilton at the head of the Treasury, Knox, ay, sir, Knox, in the Department of War, and Bradford was Attorney General, than they are now? Were our officers, with about one half the present salary, less dignified then, than they are now, with double the amount? I wish to know if that (I was going to say) unrivalled Chief Justice of the United States, has any more dignity now, when his salary is $5000, than he had when it was $4000? Or whether his Associates are more dignified now they get $4000, than they were when the salary was but $3500? They are the same men, they perform the same services, and with the same ability and integrity. Sir, I did not intend to trespass on the House so long as I have done, but out of the fullness of my heart I have spoken. Sir, I believe that the country I live in is quite as well off as any of those adjacent to it, and this may perhaps, be owing to the fact of its being too far removed from any Bank, from this Pandora's box, for us to receive our full portion of its blessings, which, like those of the evil spirits, are curses. But, sir, there is hardly a man in the sphere of my knowledge, who makes one per cent, upon the value of his plantation and stock. For one such, I can shew you twenty persons whose account of profit and loss, if they keep any, will exhibit a balance on the wrong side of the Leger. Sir, the country is in an unexampled state. I can remember nothing like it, though I remember well when Lord Cornwallis passed triumphantly through the South, carrying all before him, before the battle of Guilford. I remember well the peace of '83, and even then, when we had nothing like this state of things, although the paper money of that day did its office, we had a forty shilling year for tobacco, and fifteen and twenty shilling years for many years thereafter; and yet even then the times were not like these. Sir, there is not a planter within the sphere of my knowledge, or not a farmer, if you please, with no other resource but his farm, who has one shilling at the end of the year, even though he may not have spent, in the course of it, one shilling on himself. The expenses swallow up all the profits, and, in most cases, far exceed them. And why is this? Sir, we have been legislated into this thing—would to God, we could be legislated out of it again—facilis descensus Avernii. Aye, Sir, but the return revocare gradum superasque eadere ad auras hic labor, hoc opus est. Sir, we have been impoverished till we have scarce enough of spirit left to act like men. Yet we hear that the expenses of this Government are only such as comport with the dignity—yes, Sir, the dignity of a poor man with a Sheriff at his back—such as comport with the dignity of this great Metropolis. The dignity, Sir, of vainly endeavoring to rival the Representatives of Autocrats and Kings, instead of exercising Industry and Economy. But when I say economy, I do not mean merely the economy of lopping off. I know very well, Sir, that economy is one thing, and parsimony is quite another. But I would couple industry with frugality, and associate it with all the domestic virtues. But no, Sir, our sons must be educated at the public expense, and when the People are in distress, we must look from their own or our improvidence for some canal, or some road, or some woollen manufactory, to any thing for relief—but industry and self denial—and to ascribe the disease to any thing but the true cause, unwise legislation and prodigality. And when I say this, Sir, I don't mean to exempt the States from the charge. No, sir, not at all. I do not mean to exempt Virginia, and I will never vote for a man to represent me in her Legislature, who will not there vote for short sessions and low taxes. And if it becomes necessary, as it never yet has been, I will turn out, Sir, and electioneer against him upon these very grounds.

Retrenchment.

[JAN. 24, 1823.]

That is a good Government which takes from the People nothing that it can spare. I mean nothing that the Government can do without. I would always give the requisite supplies. Yes, sir, I would not stop the supplies unless the Government refused to redress grievances; but, if it did, I would follow the example of those very ancestors who are now quoted on the other side. Yes, sir, I would then stop the supplies. I would not hesitate to vote against any item in an appropriation bill; yes, sir, and against the appropriation bill itself, if I could get at my object in no other way. Sir, we are the keepers of the People's money, and what other function can be so important? If you let me have the keeping of your money, I shall be very glad to be discharged from the custody of your person and the protection of your wife and children. Such a state of things would benefit me much more than if you were an Ethiopian. Sir, look at the condition of other People. Look at the state of the Irish, that brave, honest, gallant, warm-hearted People (too warm hearted, I grant you, sometimes, when their hearts sail too fast for their heads.) They are the most oppressed of the human race. I make no exception, sir; no, none at all: But do I take part with their oppressors? Far from it. Look at the People of England. I ask the House to turn their eyes to the sea-girt isle. And, sir, I hesitate not to acknowledge that I feel towards that country as a Greek of Syracuse would feel towards Peloponnesus. The French, indeed, are not so badly off, yet many of them are extremely wretched, if that can be called an extreme, which, like Milton's fire, has an extreme still more fierce beyond it. You see there the same empiricism, the same Charlatanerie that we see here. There is, at this moment, within three miles of St. Stephen's Chapel, more misery and more vice than exists on the whole of North America, the West Indies included. And what is the cure, sir? The philanthropists, instead of ferreting out that which is immediately under their noses, or rather which they are glad to stop their noses to avoid, occupy themselves in taking care of the slaves of Mr. Watson Taylor, Mr. Beckford, Mr. Hibbert, and other West India gentlemen, whose condition, in comparison with the canaille of St. Giles's, St. Peter's, Westminster, and other quarters of London, is a condition of independence, virtue, and happiness. The misery before their eyes they cannot see—their philanthropy acts only at a distance. (I will not say only, for there are some very good men, no doubt, who do relieve the sufferings at home.) Their philanthropy acts only through their ears, and not through their eyes—they reverse the Horatian maxim, that what a man sees affects him more than what he hears. Sir, there are lazzaroni—I used the word because they are so—there are lazzaroni all over Europe, and I am far from sure that we shall not have some of them here—they were lazzaroni only who took up arms in defence of Naples—sturdy beggars, if you please—sturdy dogs—but as far above the condition of the oppressed peasantry of Ireland in food and raiment, as a slave here is above the condition of a slave in the West Indies.

Sir, I am very sensible that I have wandered somewhat from the point in debate—seduced, probably, by that very kind attention which the House has accorded to me. If there is any gentleman who thinks I have said too much—that I have said what I ought not to say, or, at least I ought to have said it—let such a gentleman remember that it has not been owing to me that this subject is here. For myself, I should be satisfied if we could pass the other appropriation bill, and then go home. I hope we shall pass upon such salaries as are to be abolished or retrenched here, in this House, and not suffer the subject to go to a committee at all, until we shall have settled the principle. I am in favor neither of the amendment, nor of the resolution. I shall vote against both. If we are of opinion that any officer of the Government receives too much salary, why must we send one of our committees on a voyage of discovery, or rather of un-discovery—for they can and will discover nothing.

Sir, I shall add no more at present. I have many and heavy things to say—high matter, sir—when the proper time shall come; but I reserve it until then.

Mr. BARNEY being opposed to the amendment, said he was unwilling to be confined by a rigid construction of the rules of order to a discussion of their merits, and would ask the indulgence of the House, in noticing the remarks submitted, while the original proposition was under consideration. His mercantile education induced him always to desire to close promptly every account opened against him, and he hoped that the debate would not leave him in debt, as he was anxious not to appear in this House a public defaulter.

Mr. B. acknowledged many obligations to the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKNAN] for his occasional notice of him, and proposed, in the first instance, to discharge the debt of gratitude due to him. This gentleman has declared, that, for many years, it has been his serious conviction, that the per diem compensation was too large, and yet he has drawn the full amount from the Treasury, and appropriated it to his individual use, without ever having submitted a proposition to reduce it. Sir, it is conscience doth make cowards of us all. I presume not to judge for others; but, had this been my conviction, my conscience would have dictated a different course. No member on this floor enjoys, or is justly entitled to higher consideration than the gentleman from Pennsylvania; occupying a distinguished station on one of the most important committees, a motion from him to enquire into the expediency of reducing the compensation would have carried great weight. I cannot learn that such an intimation has ever been made. I know not the rate at which he values his services. I have ever attached to them the highest value. I learn that six dollars a day is his own estimate: he certainly does himself injustice in the appraisement. The Treasury would not gain much by the difference—yet my course would have been to compromise with my conscience, and draw just as much as I thought myself fairly entitled to, leaving the balance for public use. Mr. B., however, did not desire that his opinions should become the rule of action for others; he found the pay fixed at eight dollars, and was willing to leave it so—reserving to himself the privilege of disbursing any surplus that might remain, after paying his bills in Washington, to defray the expense of an electioneering campaign.

He coincided in opinion with his friend from Pennsylvania, that the whole amount was no compensation for the sacrifice made, in a pecuniary point of view, by every member on this floor. Were his pursuits of a professional character, the income derived from his practice must be small, indeed, if it did not exceed a thousand dollars a year; was he a merchant or a farmer, his entire neglect and abandonment of his domestic pursuits must prejudice them at least that amount. In his judgment, their constituents did not require of them to make any reduction, which, if done at all, would go back to the old rates of six dollars, and the saving was not worth the discussion.

The gentleman from Kentucky commenced his argument this morning under some excitement, caused by my notice of his introductory remarks yesterday. I regret it, because, disposed to treat every gentleman with respect, I would not be deficient in courtesy to young members: for their country have much to hope for them; and, if any individual of this House will say that I was wanting in courtesy, I will not hesitate to acknowledge and atone for it. In allusion to my venerable self, he certainly has forgotten the respect due to my supposed age: for, in fact, there cannot be many years difference between us. I thank Heaven I still have some of the fire of youthful blood in my veins; and, notwithstanding my alleged imbecility, I have just discernment enough to see that he is on such good terms with himself, that I will not seek to disparage him in his own esteem, by retorting any uncourteous epithets; and, if he is in love with himself, would not rob him of a rival: for, where ignorance is bliss, it were folly to be wise. He has gravely asked, why his constituents send him here? On my conscience, although I have reflected on the subject, I do not know—therefore cannot give him a satisfactory answer. He alleges that I have considered him a bird of flight. Not so. I frankly say to the gentleman, that, ere he has arrived at my advanced age, (I speak in reference to my political life,) his experience will convince him that a few days' residence here is too short to allow him to arrive at a conclusion that, in this (which I consider the most economical Government on earth) extravagance and prodigality have full sway, and that he is competent to the great work of reform. Earnestly desiring to cultivate the good will of all mankind, I am particularly anxious to move in perfect harmony with the Representatives of the People in this Hall, with whom it is my duty to co-operate; and, to convince the gentleman that I feel none of the irritability of old age, I proffer him the right hand of fellowship, with unfeigned sincerity. On a proper occasion, I am ready, in the language of my chevalier friend from Mississippi, to cavil on the ninth part of a hair, and go as far as him who dares go farthest. Age shall not shield me from responsibility here or elsewhere.

In point of fortune, I can assure the gentleman, there can be but little disparity between us. I will not thank my God I am not worth a ducat; but, if merely a sufficiency to live with economy and industry, places us on a par, we are so. He supposes that the franking privilege enjoyed by members, gives great political influence. If but one party existed, it might be thus exercised; but so nearly are they equipoised, that a counteracting and neutralising influence is produced, and no misrepresentation can circulate among the People uncontradicted. As for my single self, I care not how soon it is abolished. The proceeds of public lands are supposed to be diminished by the heavy expenses attending the survey and sale of them. From one of these much-abused pile of printed documents which encumber our tables, I learn that the sum total of expense amounts to but three-fourths per cent.: so that, of thirty-one millions of dollars received into the public Treasury from this source, not quite one million has been deducted, to meet charges of every description. Averse to the proposition submitted, in every shape, more especially as the honorable mover has not, after few weeks devoted to public life, been able to point out a solitary instance of prodigality or extravagance—yet if a single one shall be designated, I pledge myself to vote for the reference.

The honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] has said, that it is best to do one thing at a time, and that this is not the accepted time to do the one thing needful. I most respectfully dissent from that gentleman. Now is the time, now the hour most propitious, in my humble opinion.

This nation will soon be called upon to exercise their sovereign authority in the choice of their rulers. Although I should find myself in an awkward dilemma, yet once convinced that there is any lurking prodigality, any deeds of darkness which cannot bear the light of noon-day, and I will enter into the scrutiny heart and hand, and aid in bringing it into prominent relief, and when convinced of its existence, will do all in my power to place honest men in the high places which, it is alleged, are now improperly filled; and if retrenchment and economy have not been the order of the day, for the four years preceding the 4th of March, 1829, will assist in elevating men who will establish them on a firm basis.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New-York, said, he had never failed to support motions of inquiry into the public expenditure. Whenever a member of this House, rising in his place, demands a scrutiny in regard to offices which he considers unnecessary, or salaries which he deems unreasonable, we owe it to ourselves, and to our constituents, patiently to hear, and candidly to examine the subject. He would not stop short of him who was disposed to go farthest in his career of retrenchment and correction of abuses. But he wished to give to the resolution a definite and intelligible form. He wished to disencumber it of its equivocal and argumentative expressions, and simply enjoin upon the Committee the doing of that which the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON] appears desirous to have performed. He sets out, said Mr. T. in his preamble resolution, by declaring, "that it is expedient to discharge the national debt without unavoidable delay." If this expression is intended to convey the idea that every resource of taxation, direct and indirect, ought now to be adopted for the purpose of expediting the extinguishment of the national debt, Mr. T. said, it would find few advocates, either in this House or out of it. No man would risk his reputation—he would not say as a statesman, but as a man of common sense—by proposing for that purpose, to lay a direct tax on the States of this Union, or by re-enacting the excises and double postages to which necessity compelled us to resort, during the late war. What, then, does the gentleman from Kentucky propose? Does he wish to divert the progress of our half-finished public works? Our fortifications, the Cumberland Road, the improvement of harbors and navigable rivers, the extension of post roads, the purchase and preservation of ship-timber, and arming the militia? I trust not. No such intention is avowed, and I presume, said Mr. T. none such is entertained; and yet these expenditures may be avoided, and, if not avoided, will delay the extinguishment of the public debt. If I understand the object of the mover of the resolution, said Mr. T. it is to abolish useless offices, to reduce extravagant salaries, and to apply the savings to the payment of the debt. That object is distinctly kept in view by my amendment, without encountering the objectionable features of the original resolution. Whatever shall be saved by retrenchment, under the existing laws, must be applied to pay our debts. At the close of the last war, the party which had declared it, and had carried the country successfully through its perils, considered its work but half done, until provision was made to relieve the country from the burden it had left on our shoulders. Our debt at that time exceeded 120 millions of dollars. For the punctual payment of the interest, and the gradual reimbursement of the principal, a sinking fund was established, which, in its regular operation, has paid the interest, and already reduced the principal of that debt, to 55 millions of dollars. Not only have the pledged ten millions been thus applied, but also all the surpluses which remained in the Treasury, over and above the sum limited by law.

There was, indeed, a period, said Mr. T. during the last Administration, when the condition of the Treasury was such, that it could not regularly pay to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund the annual ten millions. The appropriations remained a charge upon the Treasury, and although loans, to the amount of several millions, were authorized and negotiated, the Treasury still remained debtor to the Commissioners. It was in this condition of the country, when, on the one hand we were increasing our debt by loans from banks and individuals, and, on the other, not paying our debt to the Sinking Fund, that the reformers, the much abused radicals, of whom, said Mr. T. I was one, succeeded in reducing the Army, rank and file, from 10,000 to 6000 men, and disbanding useless officers. This operation saved about a million a year, which has already amounted to seven or eight millions, without the least injury to the public service. Since then, the condition of the Treasury has been more flourishing. Within the last three years, it has paid the balances it owed to the Sinking Fund. The principal of the public debt has been extinguished to an amount exceeding twenty-one millions of dollars, and nearly twelve millions paid for interest. The speedy extinguishment of the remaining debt can only be arrested by some unlooked-for national calamity. It has been steadily and most successfully pursued by the present and preceding administrations. It is the settled policy of this government, in which all men of all parties unite. Why, then, is it now brought forward, as if it were some new discovery? Surely, it cannot be necessary, for the purpose of confirming our courage to abolish useless offices or reduce extravagant salaries. I have been no advocate, said Mr. T. for raising salaries. Most of the laws increasing them, both in the Legislative and Executive branches of this Government, have been passed in opposition to my vote. When the Secretaries at the head of Executive Departments had smaller salaries, they lived less expensively. They were not required—it was not expected of them—that they should keep open house, and entertain all Members of Congress and strangers, who might visit the seat of Government. Most of them could not do it without ruin to their private fortunes. When you raised their salaries to six thousand dollars, you did them no service. You imposed upon them the necessity of living in more splendor, but in less comfort. Put the salaries back to the old standard, and they will have more time for private study and public duties; and I doubt not you will have their thanks.

My amendment, said Mr. T. does not propose to strike from the resolution one word of substance. It only expunges those parts, to some of which serious objections apply in point of fact, and all of which are at best useless. It leaves the instruction, unchanged and unrestricted, in the very words of the mover.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that, if the House should determine to adopt any resolution on the subject of reform, at the present time, it ought to contain a distinct proposition, that it was expedient to discharge the national debt as soon as possible. For this reason, he could not vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New-York, [Mr. TAYLOR.] When that gentleman moved an amendment, which, if it should prevail, would strike out all that part of the original resolution which related to the extinguishment of the public debt, he expected to hear some reasons urged for such an omission. In this he had been disappointed.

Sir, said Mr. B. I know it has become very fashionable in the present day, to say, that we are discharging the public debt too rapidly. Many deplore that it is melting away so fast: and although it has not been openly avowed that a public debt is a public blessing, yet such is the necessary tendency of the remarks which we often hear. Upon this subject, I beg the House to recur to the past history of the country. What was the amount of our debt before the late war? It had been so much reduced, that a very wise and a very great statesman felt himself at a loss to know how our surplus revenue could be expended, after the debt should be entirely extinguished. To accomplish this purpose, amendments to the Constitution were recommended. But war came; and in less than three years, the public debt increased from fifty-five to one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. It was a maxim of the Father of his Country, that, in peace it was our duty to prepare for war. How can we better prepare, than by paying our debts? According to the system which has been pursued by this Government from its origin, we have, comparatively speaking, no resource left, in time of war, but a resort to loans. They and they alone, must support our credit in the day of trial; and yet this resource had nearly been exhausted before the close of the last war. What has once been, experiences teaches us may be again. A war, by injuring our foreign trade, would cut off many of the sources of our revenue, and we should be compelled again immediately to resort to loans. I wish, then, if possible, to be clear of debt when another war shall commence. Our debt, reduced as it has been, is still much larger than it was at the declaration of the late war. A future war would, in a very few years, raise it higher than it ever has been. I am, therefore, in favor of husbanding all our resources, and applying the whole surplus, not absolutely necessary for other objects, to the extinguishment of the national debt. If, therefore, we shall pass the resolution, I trust that this object will stand in the front rank.

I know that the process of extinguishing the debt has been rapidly advancing for several years, and I do not complain that the present administration have not fairly applied the sinking fund to this purpose. Although I do not pretend to be their friend, yet I am willing to admit they have gone on to carry into effect the law creating that fund, which was so wisely enacted by our predecessors. This rapid extinguishment of the public debt has been productive of much good to the country. Among other benefits, it has essentially promoted domestic manufactures, by forcing capital into that channel of business, which would never have been thus employed, could it have remained in the public stock. I shall vote for no amendment which shall not embrace, in distinct terms, the position that the public debt ought to be extinguished as speedily as possible.

Mr. B. said he would reply in a few words to his friend

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

From Maryland [Mr. BARNEY.] He reciprocated the term friend, because he believed he could do so towards that gentleman with propriety. Said Mr. B., when I expressed myself friendly to the reduction of our own per diem allowance, I trust neither that gentleman, nor any other upon this floor, attributed my remarks to the grovelling and selfish desire of courting popularity. The people of this country are too clear-sighted and too intelligent to be deceived by such pretences. I here distinctly avow, that the saving of money to the public treasury was far from being the chief reason which influenced my mind in arriving at the conclusion that our per diem should be reduced. I firmly believe that my own constituents would not regard it a single straw, whether I should vote for eight or for four dollars per day. My motive was of a higher nature. My remarks, I trust, sprung from a nobler source. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COLFER] had reasoned upon the fact which he stated, and had drawn the fair deduction from it, he would, I think feel the force of the remarks which I intend to make. He says that but one bill has passed into a law during the present session, and that one is a bill providing for the pay of the members of Congress. I would ask that gentleman, why is this the case? Why has not more business been done? If he had asked himself these questions, he would probably have discovered the true origin of my remarks. I wish to speak with all due deference to the members of this House, when I say it is my desire, by reducing our wages, to make it our interest, as well as our duty, to do the business of the country as it arises, and go home as soon as possible. I do not wish to be in a hurry—I do not wish to act without due deliberation; and yet, I firmly believe that the public business might be better transacted than it is at present, in little more than half the period of our long sessions. I do not profess to be “an aged gentleman;” but yet, upon this subject, I can speak in the language of experience, and am glad that there are many gentlemen around me who can correct me if I should fall into error. I would ask, what has been the course of legislation which we have heretofore pursued? What have we done during the first half of every long session? I answer, comparatively nothing. The fact stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. COLFER] in regard to the business which has been transacted during the present session, is substantially true of those that are past. But I do not complain of the waste of time alone. The necessary consequence of this manner of proceeding is to force the whole business of the session in a solid mass upon the House near its close. Then we have so much to do, that we can do nothing well. There is neither time nor opportunity for investigation; and measures are adopted, the nature and character of which cannot be understood by the House. Immediately before the close of the session, we are employed in passing bills until 12, 1, 2, and 3 o’clock in the morning. I have been upon this floor at a late period of the night, when important amendments were arriving every few minutes from the Senate, which were adopted, when, I believe, there were not more than thirty or forty members present. I do know that it was then in the power of any individual, by merely calling for a division, to defeat any of these measures. This would have furnished official information to the Speaker that a quorum was not present, and then no business could have proceeded.

When the spirit of reform is abroad, I wish to try the experiment, whether we should not do more business, and do it better, in a shorter time, if our pay were less. I say we, because I am conscious that I like money quite as well, and have been quite as much to blame, as other members. As to the saving of a few dollars per day, out of the pay of each member, to the People of the United States, they disregard it, and, in that view of the subject,

I disregard it. I concur with the gentleman from Maryland, in believing it to be small game. If its tendency, however, should be, as I believe it would, to direct our attention more earnestly to the public business of the country, and to induce us to apply ourselves more industriously to discharge it, the effect would be happy. I did not wish, at the present time, to be drawn out into this explanation. It, however, became necessary. Having done so, I can now utterly disclaim the idea, that I was urged to the performance of this duty by any desire to obtain popularity, which, if it rested upon no other foundation, would be fleeting in its nature, and would not be worth possessing by any honorable man.

The gentleman from Maryland asks why I had not, ere this, made a motion to reduce our wages, as I had long been thoroughly convinced of its propriety? I answer that I have not now made such a motion; I have merely expressed my opinion. I have not set myself up as a reformer of every abuse which I see here. To become a reformer in this Government, I fear would be a most troublesome, thankless, and hopeless task, particularly if the first blow should be directed against ourselves. If I had made any motion upon the subject, which I intend to do at a proper time, I might answer him, in the language of the homely proverb, “better late than never.”

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said, I shall vote for the resolution. It was with pain I saw the apparent laugh and amusement which the resolution, and the remarks which accompanied it, afforded to some of the gentlemen of this House. Their feelings towards a new member must be very different from mine. I view such a member as coming fresh from the People, and, therefore, not long enough here to be contaminated by bad principles, or evil example. He is fresh from the oven of public opinion; and, as such, bearing the impress of the People. The gentleman from Kentucky speaks, I do not doubt, the sentiments of seven-eighths of the honest and intelligent People whom we represent. What he speaks is not his own language; it is the language of the People. And while I listened to him, I felt an emotion of shame that I should, in any degree, during the little time I have been here, have weakened my feeling of reverence for what I believe to be the will of my constituents. The Constitution itself, by appointing a periodical term for our service here, reminds us of the principle that the representatives in this hall ought, from period to period, to come fresh from the People, reflecting their sentiments and speaking their language. And, sir, he who disregards this principle, will most certainly fall a victim to his own folly; and, in saying this, I do not speak the dreams of imagination, but the language of fact. It has been said, in this discussion, that we have the cheapest Government on earth. Have we, sir? I can call the attention of gentlemen to one which has outlived all the republics of the world—of Athens, of Sparta, and all the other republics of Greece. There is not one among them all which is equal in this respect to the little republic of San Marino, which has endured now for fourteen hundred years. So long, sir, as a republic continues simple, its Government cheap, and its people virtuous, it will perpetuate their happiness; but as soon as the Government becomes splendid, and its officers grow into rulers, it will surely be of short continuance. Now, sir, what is the present situation of this cheap Government? Why, sir, would it be believed that the number of persons actually engaged in it amounts to double the number of our military force? Yet such is the fact at this moment. The number of officers in the various departments of this Government, civil and military, amount to no less than nine thousand. Can they all be really useful? No, sir, it is impossible. I have been informed, said Mr. M., and believe, that, in the Ordnance Department, the disbursement of about three hundred thousand dollars costs the Government nearly seventy thousand. Sir, in this there must be something wrong. There must be something rotten in Denmark.

Retrenchment.

Sir, it has been said that the gentleman from Kentucky ought to have pointed out the particular mischief which he wished to remedy. But this is not in the power of any individual, unless he can devote the whole of his time to the inquiry. And I therefore hope this resolution will not be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, but will be confided to a Select Committee, who may be employed exclusively in this investigation. And I have entire confidence in the discretion of the Chair, that such members only will be put upon it, as are not already burdened. I hope they will go into the numerous Departments, and search every thing to the bottom. I repeat, there are now, 9,338 persons employed in these various Departments. Sir, is this like a Republic? It is like any thing else in the world. Within the small period I have enjoyed a seat on this floor, I have witnessed a very strong desire to multiply offices, but no movement of reform. It has been said by a gentleman more aged in experience than I, [Mr. RANKIN] that this is not the accepted time. Sir, I cannot agree with that gentleman. It is always the time to do good. Now is the accepted time. A continual drip will at length wear a hole in a stone, and so will continual perseverance, in attempting retrenchment, eventually succeed; and I have been delighted to see, in so many members of this House, a disposition to carry forth this measure to the good of the country. Look, sir, at the vast expenditure of this Government, and compare that expenditure with the simple form of the Government itself. This, sir, is the true principle of comparison, and not to compare our expenses with the expenses of England, of Russia, of Austria, or of France. Such a comparison is manifestly unjust. Our own Government stands alone, and the parallel will not apply. When we look at the simplicity of its machinery, we shall find the Government of Great Britain a very unfaithful monitor. It will be worse if we go to that of Russia, and it will not be better if we look at any Kingly Government whatever. How many new offices have been created since the days of our prosperity? And when I speak of the days of prosperity in this Republic, I refer to the first days of Mr. Jefferson's Administration. Those were the days of its glory. The Republic has been deteriorating ever since, and will soon slide, unless carefully restrained, into the ocean of profligacy. The gentleman told us that the Military Academy at West Point did not confine its benefits to the sons of the well-born, and the rich. But, sir, I ask what orphan son of a widowed mother is ever recommended to that institution? No, sir; we recommend a boy, whose father is abundantly able to educate him, and we do it because that father is also able to aid us in our election to this House. The gentleman says the school is conducted with the greatest Republican simplicity. Sir, I am at a loss to know what idea the gentleman attaches to those terms. If ever there was a monarchical institution on the face of the earth, the military school of France not excepted, this certainly is one. Sir, it is one of the very creatures of royalty. But we have been told that we must not stop here; that we must have a naval institution also, in which young men from the first circles may receive their education, also at the public expense; and I venture to say, when they have got it, they will be more useless, if possible, than before. But it is with these that our navy is to be filled. Then, to crown all, we are to have a national university, intended, no doubt, to prepare young men for filling seats on this floor: then, sir, all things will be going on beautifully, and the poor people will be run down under our feet. God save me and my posterity from any such Republican institutions. Sir, we are misled by names. A spade is not called a spade. We call these Republican institutions. But I say let the States educate their own sons. Let us have that cradle which brought forth a Washington and a Jackson, to bless their country. When, sir, did gentility do any thing for the public good? When did pomp and show prolong the date of a Republic? Remember how Thebes mouldered into ruins when her people sought to out-vie the Persians. Remember what became of Sparta when she forgot the simple laws of Lycurgus. So will this Government crumble into ruin, before twenty years, unless we stop the wheels of its downward course in profligacy and extravagance. We come from our homes, many of us at least, poor and penniless—we look at the magnificence of this Hall—we learn to attend upon levees, and to bow to those who are in fact our servants, and we soon disdain to own that we were poor. We are dressed at the public expense, and soon cut a fine figure, but this course will soon destroy us unless we stop midway in our mad career.

With regard to the pay of the members, I will, however say, that if any branch of the Government is miserably paid, it is the members of Congress. Their pay is a compensation which a poor young man of genius does not to receive: for, should he make the attempt, he sees nothing but starvation before him. The pay offers him no compensation for the losses he must necessarily sustain in quitting the whole of his pursuits in life; whether those pursuits be professional, agricultural, or mechanical, the pay presents no indemnity for their loss. Sir, who do we find in these seats? We find either men of great wealth, or men reckless of their future comfort, or bachelors without family or dependents. I say, and I insist on it, that we are worse paid than any other persons in this Government. We have more arduous duties, if, indeed, we would perform them—I do not mean to say that we do fully perform them; but, if we did, we should labor harder than any other persons in this Government; and yet the sorriest drudge in one of the Departments receives more than we do, unless, indeed, it be some messenger, or still inferior menial. I will candidly tell the House my opinion in this matter. It is, that one of two things ought to be done. The pay of members of Congress ought either to be raised so as to reward the exertion of the first talents in the country, or it ought to be reduced to what will barely pay the expenses of our decent living. To talk of our present pay being a compensation for our leaving our business to come here, is perfectly idle. Why, sir, in the few months of the last vacation which I could spend at home, I made more money, by far, than the whole of my salary as a member of this House; and if you do not give a compensation, then give us enough to pay our bills for board, and to buy us a single suit of clothes: for, in that case, as soon as the suit was worn out, we should all go home. Sir, gentlemen tell us of our overflowing Treasury. There is one view in which an overflowing Treasury is a curse. As soon as it is known, a species of pecuniary mania seizes upon us all, and we seem to think that every individual may dive his arm into it, and scatter its contents to the four winds. So far, an overflowing Treasury proves to be a curse, and as far, too, as we make use of it merely to throw the public money into our respective neighborhoods. I do not ask, now, whether the purpose be constitutional or not. The evil, sir, lies in our own degenerate hearts, and not in the Treasury. Were it not for this, however, the Treasury might be replenished—we should not be contaminated by the brilliant shiners it might contain. We should then remember that the money there is the bone and sinew of our country's strength. Sir, the resolution cannot but have a good effect. It will at least make the officers, who are already in place, something more circumspect in their expenditures. We have a contingent fund here and a contingent fund there, and every little office has its contingent fund. It will have a still more valuable effect if it produce an inquiry into the necessity of keeping up this army of 9,000 officers. Mr. Speaker, there was a certain king who once heard his People loudly complaining under taxation, and yet, on inquiry, discovered that there was no money in his treasury. The members of his council were immediately called together—they went into a number of very warm arguments—great confusion prevailed, and the conclave came to no conclusion. The monarch dismissed his counsellors, and sent for an obscure sage who dwelt in the neighborhood: when the difficulty was explained to this wise man, he requested that the king's attendants might bring a roll of cloth, a pair of shears, a needle, and all the king's money. He immediately went to work and made as many bags as there were counsellors, and one more. He then distributed the money among all the counsellors' bags, and taking up the empty bag which remained, he presented it to the King, saying, "and there is your Majesty's share." He then made his bow and retired. The King immediately dismissed his Counsellors, when his treasury was soon full, and all his People happy. Sir, it only impoverishes the People, to set up so many dignitaries among us. I am for giving our officers an adequate compensation, but not for appointing twenty men to do the duty of one.

I shall oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York, because it strikes out the clause, which declares the end of the whole inquiry. But I suggest to the gentleman who moved the resolution, so to modify it, as to substitute a "Select Committee" for the "Committee of Ways and Means."

Mr. M'DUFFIE agreed in this suggestion—he had no sort of objection to the investigation, but he hoped the House would pass upon the measure without farther discussion. He would take the liberty to remind gentlemen that short speeches made a short session.

Mr. CHILTON now said, that he was entirely willing to modify this resolution, as had been proposed. He believed the Committee of Ways and Means to be made up of able members, prepared to breast a thunder storm, and he had, therefore, at first selected that committee. He said a few words in explanation of his reply to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARREY.] The gentleman had mistaken him, if he supposed that he meant to say that that gentleman was superannuated. What he had said on that subject, was wholly of a general nature, and was not intended to have any individual application. As, however, the gentleman had said that, under particular circumstances, he should not plead his age, so he could assure that gentleman that he should not plead his youth. He concluded with moving the appointment of a Select Committee.

Mr. DANIEL, of Kentucky, said, that he had not intended to trouble the House with any remarks of his, either upon the original proposition, or the amendment to it: nor should he now have done it, but for the keen sarcasms which had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland. So far as the original resolution proposes an inquiry into the propriety of reducing the public expenditures, so far, Mr. D. said, he heartily concurred in its provisions: and it was extremely painful to him to discover that the honorable gentleman from Maryland attempted to turn this investigation into ridicule and reproach, and had attempted to play off his wit upon his colleague. At some of his remarks, said Mr. D. I was amused, though I did not entirely approve of them, nor could I discover the force of the argument which they conveyed. His great argument appeared to be, that, if the pay of members of Congress were to be reduced, they could not so well educate their horses to go electioneering: and indeed, sir, when those remarks fell from the member, I was greatly at a loss to determine which possessed the most native genius, the horse which was spoken of, or his master.

[The SPEAKER here declared all personal observations to be out of order.]

It was not my wish, said Mr. D., to make any personal allusion whatever, further than in reference to remarks which have been applied to my colleague: but if the statement of the gentleman was to be believed, his horse was much more intelligent than the greater part of his constituents. That breed of horses, Mr. D. went on to say, would be very acceptable in his country, and would save a great deal of expence, &c. This argument about the horse appeared to him to be the great and only argument of the gentleman from Maryland against the resolution, except that the mover of it was a young member, who had been in the House only two or three days, and that it was therefore highly improper that he should attempt a measure of such great importance to the community.

The adoption of this measure, Mr. D. said, would, in his opinion, produce much good. It would set on foot an inquiry whether the public expenditures are not exorbitant, and ought not to be reduced. In any general attempt to reduce the public expenditures, it was highly expedient that Congress should set the example. Let us (said he) begin by reducing our own compensation, and then other public officers will have no reasonable ground of complaint if we should reduce their salaries, which measure might otherwise be made a matter of reproach to us. It is my opinion that, with proper prudence and economy, a man may be paid for his services and live very well on six dollars per day; and when gentlemen seem to think that two dollars saving per day is not worthy of the deliberate consideration of such a dignified body as Congress, they ought to consider that the saving of two dollars per day on the pay of each member would amount to hundreds of dollars per day: and for the number of days in each session, would amount to an immense saving. Such would be the effect of reducing the pay of members from eight dollars per day to six, or five, or four dollars per day; and members might live here comfortably for less than the latter sum, the expenses of living in this city being nothing like what he had anticipated and expected when he left home.

In our own State, where the members of the Legislature receive two dollars per day for their services, they live well during the annual session, and return home, at the end of it, with 50 or 60 dollars in their pocket, &c. Another reason which induced Mr. D. to favor a reduction of the public expenditures, was, that it was proposed to increase the duties on woollen goods, &c. to such an extent as to operate as a prohibition on their importation, the consequence of which would be, that the People must be taxed, by a direct tax, for the support of this Government: and gentlemen, who were in favor of what was called the tariff principle, ought to consider, if they meant to press that measure, that it was indispensable that the expenses of the Government should be retrenched. To this, he presumed, a portion of the public officers could have no great objection; and especially the Secretary of the Treasury, who was so desirous that the import duties on certain articles should be augmented.

It had been remarked, by the gentleman from New York, in assigning the reason why he was in favor of his amendment, that the National Debt is already extinguished as fast as any one can wish, and that we shall have more money in the Treasury than we have any use for. When that should be the case, Mr. D. said, he should thank the General Government for a few appropriations for the benefit of the State of which he was a Representative, which had hitherto experienced none of the benefits of this overflowing Treasury, whilst they paid their full proportion of the public revenue, to be expended on the sea-board; where its expenditure was perhaps more to the interest of those who had the direction of the expenditure. Time after time, said he, we have been amused with projects of Internal Improvement, but until the last Summer we never had sight of an Engineer, to shew us where a stone was to be placed or removed, &c. and the Engineers who had visited the State last Summer, had travelled over the ground as rapidly as men usually travel, at the rate of five or six miles an hour—from whom he supposed in due time we should have a report. Mr. D. said, he was in favor of Internal Improvement, and he wished to see a retrenchment of the salaries of perfectly useless officers, that the saving might afford the means of making roads and canals, which roads and canals he wished to see made by the States, and not under the jurisdiction of Congress. If there is a surplus in the Treasury (said he) let it be divided amongst the States for that purpose.

There were a number of officers in the Government, whom Mr. D. said he believed to be perfectly useless. There was the Fourth Auditor, for example; and he believed there were at least three of the Auditors whose offices could be dispensed with, without detriment to the Public service—who might be lopped off, if he correctly understood the nature of their duty, which was little more than, when the subordinate officers felt in any difficulty as to any accounts before them, to decide whatever questions they might present; and, for his part he would as soon depend upon the judgment of the Clerk in general, as upon that of the Auditor. Eleven o'clock was about the hour at which these officers attended in their offices, and at two or three o'clock, (he did not exactly know which,) the offices were shut up. Now, Mr. D. said, in the State in which he lived, a man employed to labor for a compensation, had to work from Sun to Sun, and, if necessary, a little in the night, and surely the Principals and Clerks in Public offices, comfortably provided for as they were, with large contingent funds at their disposal, &c. ought to perform more labor than they do for their salaries, some at a thousand dollars, some at fifteen hundred, some at two thousand, some at three thousand dollars, and perhaps some at three thousand five hundred dollars each. This, Mr. D. said, was extravagance in the extreme. All this pomp, splendor, and pride, was of no consequence to this Government; and whenever this Government was destroyed, it would be in consequence of the licentiousness and corruption of its own citizens, created by the example of the Government—for so long as the Government is pure, &c. so long will the People be, and no longer. Here, in this House, (said Mr. D. in conclusion,) let the example be set of retrenchment and reform.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25, 1828.

Mr. STORRS, from the committee to which was referred the bill fixing the ratio of representation after the 3d day of March, 1833, reported—

“That they have had the said bill under consideration, and are of opinion, that it is not expedient, at this time, to pass any law relating to the subject; and that the committee had instructed their chairman to ask that they may be discharged from the further consideration of the said bill.”

The committee was discharged accordingly, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions heretofore submitted by Mr. CHILTON. The following amendment, moved by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, being under consideration:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into, and report to this House, what officers, in their opinion, may be most advantageously discontinued; what salaries will reasonably bear reduction; and such other means of retrenchment as to them may seem necessary.”

Mr. FLOYD, of Va. rose and said that he was opposed to the amendment, because, in his judgment, it was not likely to result in any thing beneficial either here or elsewhere. It amounts, in substance to this, that a Committee shall be directed to tell this House that which they already perfectly know—that there is prodigality and waste in the expenditures of this Government; and because that very thing on which the whole nation has so long felt the greatest anxiety, is, by this amendment, to be stricken out of the resolution. I mean, said Mr. F., the expediency of discharging, as speedily as possible, the national debt. The time has now arrived when this House is bound to do something decisive in its character. Heretofore, the operation of this Government has been, in a great degree, beyond our limits, and confined to objects of a constitutional character; but now a new era has opened upon us, and we are about to feel all those calamitous consequences which its measures and policy are destined to bring upon the People. It is very true that the doctrine advanced under the elder Adams, that a national debt is a national blessing, has not now been distinctly avowed; but the same doctrine is substantially advanced, in a different shape. We have been told that a national debt, for which stock is issued by the Government, is beneficial and desirable, because it enables capitalists to invest their money in the United States securities, and then, if death overtakes them, a permanent provision is made for their wives and families. The interest on their investment, though not, perhaps, so great as that arising from other stocks, is sure and can be received with certainty, being free from all those risks and changes which arise from the misconduct of Bank Directors, and other contingencies to which it would be liable, if invested either in commerce, or in the stock of turnpike roads, steamboats, canals, &c. which seem to be the mania of the day.

We approach an era in which the cash operations of Government are turned in upon itself; when it lays hold of all the money it can get, for purposes of a local character; when it operates upon objects instead of on principles; at such a time the extinction of the National Debt is a thing earnestly to be avoided by all politicians in power. But if the Government shall thus continue to press on objects calculated to throw back the money of the nation into the hands of capitalists; if it endeavors to throw back on their hands the whole of the National Debt, and then to urge upon us a tariff calculated to exhaust the whole of the surplus, and press that tariff to the point of prohibition on certain articles, then I ask how is it possible that we can exist under such a state of things? It is avowed that they mean to press the tariff to prohibition. Now, the property of all the Middle, the Western, and the Southern States, consists in the product of their lands; and, under this system, we are called to legislate away all the value of those lands. The farmer is now selling his produce at a price so small that it will hardly enable him to pay his taxes; and at such a time you are going to compel him to pay an addition of from 10 to 180 per cent. on the price of every article he buys. If you let the National Debt remain as it now is, you compel the country to raise a sum annually, which is equal to your whole Sinking Fund; and, by doing so, you maintain a system which will crush the People of this country into that state of want and penury of which my colleague spoke when he decrified to us the condition of the population of Ireland and England.

We were told by the gentleman from Maryland, that there is a difference between parsimony and economy

JAN. 25, 1838.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

I admit it. I trust that we are not now to be told that parsimony is one thing and economy another. Who has denied it? But I say, that it is not a good argument to prove that this Government is economical, to tell us that the printing of the English Government alone, amounts to as much as all the expences of our own. I am sorry for the English People. It is true, I bear them no love—I have no great reason to love them. But look at their own statements. They acknowledge that one third of their population are paupers. While they have a Nobility that are rolling in wealth and splendor—the richest Nobility, perhaps, at this time in the world—the People are beggars in the streets of London; and it is calculated that, in that great and proud city, one man perishes every day, from actual hunger. [Here Mr. RANDOLPH said, in an under tone, more than one.] My colleague says there are more than one, and he is much better informed on this subject than I pretend to be.

What a spectacle is here presented to the American People! We have been asked why this object of retrenchment has not been sought in England? Sir, it has been sought there, and the man who, in my opinion, deserves a monument for his exertions, has been imprisoned, and reduced to beggary, and that through the influence which is derived from patronage—from patronage which is exerted by the Government there very much as it has been by the Department of State in this country, and which is calculated to produce ruin and corruption, if it has not already done it, in our country. I have been willing to reform abuses ever since I have had a seat on this floor, and in laboring to reform them I have encountered what the gentlemen from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] said was a misfortune, the being called a Radical—though I do not know that it is so great a misfortune. The Executive influence in this Government is very great. It has been exerted to calumniate members in this House, as well as great and wise men out of the House. It has attempted to cut them off by dark inuendoes; and hiring scribblers, whether from England or Germany, I will not say, have been paid, directly or indirectly, for performing the task. Sir, are we to be told that the expences of the contingent fund under the control of this Government have not increased? They have increased, they are increasing, and ought to be diminished. They have increased, and that to an alarming extent. Are we to be told that there are no abuses in the application of that fund, and that we ought not to correct these abuses, because the expense of printing alone for the British Parliament is equal to the whole expense of this Government? Sir, if you take into calculation what the People of the United States pay to support the Governments of the several States, and of this General Government in addition, you will find that they pay a sum equal to that paid by the People of England, under all their commercial depressions, and all the misery and degradation to which they are reduced. I am, therefore, in favor of paying the national debt by all the means that the Government can lay its hands on; and I am not now to be persuaded that the sinking fund is going to extinguish it in a year or two, because the Secretary of the Treasury has told us so. Sir, I remember a time, at the close of the last war, when a man, whom every body will allow to have been much more capable of judging and speaking on the finances of this country than the gentleman who has now the charge of them, told us, that in fourteen years, the public debt would be paid; but it is not paid yet, nor is it likely to be while we take money out of the treasury for all sorts of wild and visionary projects. We borrow on one side to pay upon the other, and the money that is now due is paid only by a new loan, at a less rate of interest. Gentlemen say that the sinking fund will pay off the debt in due time; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] has told us that he is not prepared to say that it ought to be increased. This expression of not being prepared to advocate a thing, I take to be a Congressional mode of saying that one is opposed to it.

[Mr. TAYLOR here begged leave to explain, and Mr. FLOYD having yielded the floor for that purpose,

Mr. TAYLOR observed: I stated that, by the existing law, all the surplus in the Treasury, besides the ten millions annually reserved, was carried to the sinking fund. The present balance, he believed, was about two millions. Whatever the amount might be, it went to that fund. Whatever might be saved by retrenchments would also go there. He was perfectly willing that every necessary retrenchment should be made, and that the avails should be consecrated to this object; but he did not suppose that it was the desire of any gentleman to make a formal addition to the ten millions, which were settled, by the act of 1816, as constituting an annual sinking fund.

Mr. RANDOLPH now asked his colleague to indulge him with the floor, while he put a single question to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FLOYD having signified his assent—

Mr. RANDOLPH asked—Do I understand the gentleman as affirming that the whole of the ten millions has regularly been applied to the reduction of the national debt?

Mr. TAYLOR said, in reply, that, during the former Administration, there had been a period when, owing to the embarrassments of our commerce, and the falling off of the revenue, which was its necessary consequence, the Treasury was unable to pay to the sinking fund the whole amount of the annual ten millions required by law. This, if he rightly remembered, occurred about the years 1818, 1819, and 1820. It was when the Radicals were the majority in this House. He had not spoken of Radicals as unfortunate, but as much abused. The Treasury, in former years, had paid to the sinking fund more than ten millions per annum. At the close of the last Administration the Treasury was somewhat in arrear to the sinking fund, because the sums paid, over ten millions, in any year, could not be carried to the credit of the next year, inasmuch as all the surpluses of any year belonged to that fund. Although in the former Administration the full amount of ten millions had not been regularly paid by the Treasury to the sinking fund, yet, during the present Administration, more than ten millions had been thus regularly paid, and since the organization of the present sinking fund, to this time, a sum greater than the aggregate amount of the ten millions, annually pledged for that purpose, had been applied to the payment of the public debt; but it had not always been regularly applied.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied, that it would be perceived that, if, at any time, the whole of the ten millions had not been applied to the reduction of the public debt, then the public had been trifled with. The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were bound to apply the whole of the ten millions, and the surpluses too, whatever they might be. But if they rob—no, Sir—I will not say rob—that is a harsh term—but if they take any thing from the sinking fund, from what fund can they repay it? If by loans, that, as my colleague forcibly expressed it, would be robbing Peter to pay Paul. If it has been repaid from surplus balances, then they have only paid the sinking fund what ought to have been in that fund before: for, if they ever take a single farthing from the sinking fund, they can never repay it—it is impossible, ex vi termini. They have only loans or surpluses, out of which to make up the deficiencies—and the surpluses all belong to the sinking fund already. Sir, this is as clear—aye, Sir, and much clearer—than the light from that window.

Mr. TAYLOR replied, the gentleman from Virginia is certainly correct; the fact is as he has stated it.

H. of R.]

Retrenchment.

[JAN. 25, 1828.]

But that, I say, is not the fault of the present Administration. They have paid the whole ten millions annually, and they have repaid, besides, part of the former deficiencies in the sinking fund.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That, I understand, they could not do: for they had nothing to pay with.]

Mr. FLOYD now resumed. Will the gentleman from New York assert that the present Administration has applied the whole ten millions to the payment of the public debt? Sir, I wish to impress on gentlemen from the agricultural States, the Middle, Western, and Southern States, what will be the state of things when the whole of the public debt shall be paid, and what now forms the sinking fund shall be a surplus in the Treasury. This is the very crisis that I fear—a crisis which the lynx-eyed People who have been referred to, have seen most clearly; but, if it is the object of our lynx-eyed rulers to tax the agricultural States of the Middle and West of this Union to the whole amount of that ten millions, can we exist? What must be the end of it? I leave every temperate and well constructed mind to consider. I had rather that this measure of inquiry had been brought into the House, at the time when we could have gone through the whole of the abuses in this Government, in all their ramifications. I knew they did exist—the whole of this discussion proves they exist—but whether we can get along with the investigation of them as well without the aid of the Executive Departments as with it, I leave the House to determine. There are some other little things which I will notice. Here is Europe in a state of profound peace—we have no Minister in England—our Ambassador to Russia is almost forgotten—what our Minister at Paris is doing I do not know—at Colombia we have none—but we have a splendid Tacubaya mission to amuse us in the mean time. Our accounts are settled in an entirely new way—whether by the celebrated Fifth Auditor, or by direction of Congress, he would not say. The very clothes of our Ministers are paid for at the public expense, and patterns are engraved on copper, and kept at the Department of State, that those gentlemen may be able to give suitable directions to their tailors. I do not know that I find very much fault with this, but one thing I am sure of, we give our agents abroad most ample and liberal salaries, and quite sufficient to enable them to appear as an American gentleman ought to appear. If the allowance is not sufficient, let them come to this House and say it is not, and if they can shew that that is the case, I pledge myself, for one, to make it most ample. But I would do it with this understanding, that, when the business for which the Minister was sent was completed, he shall come home. Then we shall be relieved from the expence of much of that useless splendor and show which some of our Ministers are aping abroad. I do not know, in the history of this country, or of the world, a more pleasing spectacle than the appearance of Livingston and Franklin at the Court of France, in plain well-made Republican dresses, such as became them and the Government they represented. It is much more dignified in my eye than if they had glittered like Prince Esterhazy, who could afford to let one hundred pounds sterling's worth of jewels drop from his coat every time he put it on. We have nothing but liberty, and how can we undertake to vie with such men as Sir Wellesley Pole, each foot of whose window curtains cost five guineas—we agriculturists, whose produce is selling at ten cents a bushel or lies rotting in our warehouses? Yet we, forsooth, must go into all this sort of expenditure, because England has done so.

Sir, I will refrain from any further remarks, yet I should be glad if the resolution were a little amended. There is a part of it which partakes somewhat of the character of argument. Now, I am willing that gentlemen who support the resolution should do it on their own reasons. I shall support it for reasons of my own, but I do not chuse to vote for a measure for the reasons of others. I therefore wish the resolution could be so amended as to express nothing but the simple proposition itself.

Mr. STEWART rose to say a few words in reply to his colleague, [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. FLOYD] who had spoken against the resolution. The object of this resolution is to institute an inquiry, to ascertain whether abuses exist in the public expenditures; whether there are any unnecessary offices and salaries: and whether retrenchment may not be beneficially resorted to. For his own part he was decidedly in favor of the resolution. Let the doors of inquiry be thrown wide open; let every one enter and see for himself. He would vote for it whether referred to a Standing or a Select Committee; or whether the amendment now proposed was adopted or not; he would vote for the amendment, because the preamble proposed to be stricken out, seemed to him to contain an assumption of the very facts which it was the end and object of the proposed inquiry to ascertain. Mr. S. was decidedly in favor of every inquiry into supposed abuses; and, if found to exist, he would go with him who dares go farthest in applying the corrective. The gentleman who introduced this proposition, who comes immediately from the People, and from an highly excited political contest, tells us, what is undoubtedly true, that the public mind is excited on this subject; that the People believe the Government has become wasteful and prodigal, that abuses exist, of the most alarming character: and so strong was the popular sentiment on this subject, that he was obliged to give a pledge to his constituents, before he left them, to bring this subject immediately before the House—it was then, in his judgment, alike due to public opinion, and to the character of the Government, that this inquiry should be promptly instituted. If the alleged abuses exist, let them be exposed and remedied. If not, let these clamors be silenced by the report of a Committee of this House—let the public ear be disabused and the public mind put at rest.

He differed entirely from his colleague, [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentlemen from Virginia, [Messrs. RANDOLPH and FLOYD] who think that this is not the proper, "the accepted time," to inquire into and correct abuses. Why is this not the proper time? If abuses exist, why not now correct them? If the public money is misapplied, why not at once apply the remedy? The present is always the proper time for this work—"delays are dangerous," by delaying the remedy we sanction and increase the evil—"now is the accepted time," and every moment of delay is a dereliction of public duty on the part of those holding the corrective power.

If abuses exist; if there are too many offices; if salaries are too high or too numerous: if the public money is wastefully and prodigally expended—where is the fault? At whose door lies the sin of these offences? The fault is in this House, sir. We hold the purse strings of the nation, and we are responsible, and we will be held responsible, if we apply not the remedy promptly and efficiently. Public offices were not only created, but the salaries fixed, and their payment annually provided for, by law. Every appropriation of money for every object of expenditure, down to the lowest clerkship in the Departments, had to pass under the notice and receive the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means, and afterwards of this House. He therefore hoped the inquiry would go on—its postponement would be a disregard of public duty on the part of those who believed in the existence of the evils and abuses complained of. His colleague had said, that he considered it too late in the session; that half the session had now gone by. If half the session were gone—what have we done? It had been said, and said truly, that but one bill had yet become a law, and that was to provide for the payment of our own wages! What would become of the tariff; if half the session was gone, and no bill yet reported to the House? But, for one, if abuses existed, as had been alleged, he would stay here (however reluctant) till midsummer, if necessary, to expose and correct them, and fulfil the other duties which we owe to the country and our constituents. But, gentlemen say we must go to work “systematically;” let each individual go to work and ferret out abuses and expose them. Expose them—where? In the public prints? For what purpose, and with what view? This could lead to no practical result. No, let the resolution be adopted, let the subject be referred to a committee of this House; if abuses exist, let them report a bill for their correction; if not, let the fact be stated, and let the tongue of misrepresentation be silenced; let the injurious reports now abroad upon the wind, and wafted to the remotest parts of our country, be exposed to merited reprobation. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANKINS] says, we will, by adopting the resolution, send the committee of Ways and Means not on a voyage of discovery, but of “undiscovery;” this constituted no objection to the measure. The gentleman had alleged the existence of many and great abuses. If so, does the gentleman doubt the ability or disposition of the able Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to ferret out and expose them? He presumed not. This duty is imposed on the committee of Ways and Means, by the rules of the House; it was a duty for which they were particularly qualified, by their familiarity with the whole range of Public Expenditures constantly presented to their view. He would be glad to see an annual report from that Committee, presenting, in one clear and comprehensive view to the country, an exhibit of all the expenditures of the several Departments of Government, civil, military, commercial—with the considerations which recommend their continuance or discontinuance: thus public attention would be attracted to abuses if they existed, and if not, misrepresentation and unfounded complaints would be silenced.

As the subject of the public debt had been very extensively, and he thought rather unnecessarily, drawn into this debate, and as he thought a good deal of misapprehension prevailed on this subject, he begged to be indulged with a few remarks on this point. Gentlemen seemed all extremely anxious to pay off the public debt; but they appear to forget that they have no right to redeem it faster than it becomes redeemable. If you have a surplus of a hundred millions a year, you cannot pay the debt. You have no right to pay it before the year 1835, when the last portion of the debt will become redeemable; and a sinking fund of eight or nine millions a year will as effectually pay it off, by that time, (except three per cents.) as ten times the amount; for we all know that the public creditors will not receive the debt before it is due. They would be glad you would keep the money and pay them the interest. They deprecate the payment of the public debt more than those who have to pay it. He had made one or two calculations on the subject of the public debt, which he would present to the House; and he challenged an examination into their correctness. They had been submitted to the revision of a gentleman more than any other qualified to decide upon their accuracy, and had received his approbation. He would now offer the result of these calculations to the House.

1. By the application of eight millions for four years, and six millions thereafter for six years, the whole of the debt (except the three per cents) would be extinguished on the 1st of July, 1838.

2. Including the three per cent. stock, the whole debt would be extinguished by a sinking fund of ten millions, on the 31st of December, 1835, and by eight millions in 1838.
3. To pay the whole debt, (except the principal of the three per cents) the average sum of $8,604,753 will be required till the close of the year 1835.
4. To pay the whole debt and interest by the close of 1835, (except the principal of the three per cents, and five per cent. bank stock) the sum of 7,919,994 will be required.
5. The whole debt (except the three per cents) will be redeemed, by the semi-annual application of eight millions per annum, in 1836.

The Commissioners have no right to pay off the three per cent. stock until it falls to 65 per cent. It is a fact, with which we are all familiar, that the 3 per cents, are now at 87, and in proportion as we go on to redeem other stock, the 3 per cents will rise, because there will be the ten millions which is annually extricated by the payment of debt seeking an investment. If this stock is now at 87, instead of falling to 65, it is much more probable that it will rise to par, or perhaps still higher. You have no right then to pay off this 3 per cent. stock. That is no portion of the debt which you have any right to redeem.

It will be seen that, by a Sinking Fund of eight millions, the whole of the debt would be extinguished in 1836. There is another view. The whole of the debt would be extinguished in 1835, except the principal of the three per cents, by an annual application of $8,604,753; and before that time, we have no right to pay off the debt, if we had even 500 millions in the Treasury. Yet gentlemen talk of paying off the debt. It is demonstrable that we are not able, because we have no right to pay it off sooner than the present fund will accomplish it; and by the regular application of that fund, more than twenty millions of a surplus will remain in hand when the debt is paid.

In respect to the Bank Stock of seven millions, it is worth more than par at this moment. The annual application of $7,719,994 will pay off the last of the Public Debt in 1835, with the exception of the Bank Stock and the three per cent. stock, and double the amount could not pay it sooner. Why, then, Mr. S. asked, is the national debt always presented by gentlemen on this floor, as a bug bear, to deter us from making necessary appropriations? He hoped such a course would not be persisted in, when every attempt to discharge the debt before the year-1835 must be in vain. The too rapid payment of the debt threw a most oppressive burden upon the country; the withdrawal of ten millions a year from a very limited currency, and its application to the redemption of the public debt, a great part of which was held in Europe, was a most severe and exhausting operation upon the country. This fact accounted for the great scarcity of money, and constituted the great source of just and universal complaints which we hear from every part of our country on this subject.

The People of this country now pay into your Exchequer more than twenty millions of dollars a year, and one-half of this immense sum is withdrawn from circulation, and applied to the public debt contracted during the late war. This was unnecessarily severe; it paralyzed industry, checked enterprise, and broke down all the active energies of our country. How much better to relieve the country from a small portion of this burden, by reducing the sinking fund to seven or eight millions, and return the two or three millions thus saved to the People who pay it, to be expended in improving the internal condition of our country: it would thus run back into its usual and ordinary channels of circulation infusing new life and activity into the whole body politic; and they would not postpone the final extinguishment of the debt more than one or two years. Such a change of the present exhausting system, while it would essentially promote the public prosperity, would, he had no doubt, also meet the public approbation.

These were some of his views on the subject of the national debt, which had constituted so prominent a topic in the morning's debate. He did not support this proposition under consideration because he thought it necessary to hasten the payment of the public debt—far from it. He supported it because he thought vigilance and economy in the public expenditures, at all times, and under all circumstances, fit and proper in themselves; because he was, at all times, in favor of throwing the doors of all the Departments of this Government wide open to all who wished to look into them to correct abuses, if any existed. He was opposed to concealment, or even the appearance of it. Let the country be fully satisfied on every subject of doubt or suspicion. If there is any thing wrong, let it be dragged forth into open day—let the lash be applied where it is due, whether to the accusing or the accused. If abuses exist, let them be exhibited, and I will most heartily unite with gentlemen in applying a prompt and effectual remedy.

Mr. WEEMS said, that he had risen, not to make a speech, or to enter at all into the argument, but only to call the attention of the House to what the House itself had already done, and thereby to stop, as he hoped, any further unnecessary consumption of its time. Sir, on the 11th of January, I felt myself called upon to invite the notice of the House to this very subject. With that view I offered a resolution, which the House adopted, and thereby made it theirs, and which they sent to one of the standing Committees. On examining the rules of the House before I offered this resolution, I found that the 65th rule reads thus:

“It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and, also, to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers.”

And it did strike me that this very department of legislation was embraced under the direction of that rule. It was therefore that I offered the resolution, the House adopted it, and sent it to one of the honorable Committees to whom no other duty is assigned. In directing the reference to that Committee, I was influenced by the old adage, that what is every body's business, is nobody's; I found that there were six other Committees to whom this duty in part belonged, and that, therefore, the Committee on Expenditures did not probably think themselves particularly called upon to attend to it. But, since the House adopted my resolution, that Committee has had the inquiry before them, and they are now acting upon it, in the same manner, to all intents and purposes, all good purposes at least, as if they were a Select Committee. Now, to send the subject elsewhere, or to debate it in this House, while they have been expressly charged with it, is, to say the least, not very complimentary. It was from respect to the feelings of all the gentlemen who compose that Committee, that I voted the other day with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] to lay the resolution upon the table, and I shall oppose whatever tends to take the business out of the hands of that Committee. I will now read, Sir, the resolution which was offered by me, and adopted by the House.

“Whereas, suspicions are abroad, in our land, touching the economy of our Government, and the improper application of the Public money: And, whereas it is at all times meet and proper for the Representatives of the People to guard their property, as well as their freedom, so, also, it is equally their duty to protect the character of their officers: Therefore, Resolved, that the Committee on Public Expenditures, who have, by the 65th rule of this House, this subject more particularly committed to their charge than any other Committee, be requested forthwith to inform this House whether it be compatible with their other duties, to enter upon that sort of rigid examination necessary, by comparing with the several laws making appropriations, the disbursements under them, and the vouchers in support of them, according to the spirit and intention of the said rule, and the objects herein specified; And also to report, if necessary, what further provisions and arrangements are wanted to add to the economy of the Departments, and the accountability of their officers.”

This, Sir, as I conceive, embraces every possible object of the resolution which is now under discussion, and therefore completely supersedes that resolution.

Mr. BLAKE said, that when he came to the House this morning, it was his intention to have given his opinion on the resolutions now under consideration, but being apprehensive that he should anticipate some gentleman who was entitled to the floor, who, according to parliamentary courtesy, had a right to precede him in debate, he had declined to introduce the discussion. If, Sir, said he, I was induced, by the remarks of yesterday on this subject, to come to a determination to take part in the debate, the remarks which have just fallen from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLORIN] of a similar tenor, do certainly afford a strong additional inducement. Mr. Speaker, the question is not whether the national debt should be extinguished, but whether the present Administration is an extravagant and prodigal one or not. Before I left my constituents, to discharge the duty they had been pleased to assign me in this House, I had heard repeatedly and frequently that the patronage of the Administration had become alarmingly extensive—that the officers in various Departments under them received higher salaries than their services entitled them to, and that the disbursements of the public money were prodigal, and menacing to the liberty of the country. These complaints were not made generally without assigning a responsibility, but they were all charged upon the Administration; they helped to swell the catalogue of misrepresentation and complaint against the present incumbents in the high offices of the Government. These distinguished individuals were represented as setting an example of extravagance, of nourishing and extending the evil to the community around them at the public expense; and their conduct generally, it was emphatically said, was incompatible with the true character of a Republic, sustaining and recommending the notion that this Government should be splendid and profuse like the old Governments of the other hemisphere. That the gentleman from Kentucky has introduced this resolution, and presented the subject seriously before the House, is therefore matter for rejoicing. I shall support an inquiry into these charges most willingly. Let the resolution be adopted, let the investigation be proceeded in, and pushed thoroughly—let the gentleman and those who may be assigned to aid him have every assistance from this House, so that the inquiry may be conducted to the greatest advantage. If it be the fact, that this is such a wicked and unprincipled Administration as it is represented, let that fact be made appear and reported to us, and let every member of it tremble for the consequences that will await him from a betrayed and indignant People. But if it be mere fiction, originating in the heated minds of political zealots, let that fact also appear and let a generous acknowledgment be made. And, Sir,

AN. 25, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

trust that there is in this House a sense of generosity, a spirit of chivalry, which under all circumstances, will support its honor, and induce it to redress the calumnies and the injured. Sir, I cannot vote for all the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, but for that one which is retained in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, which contemplates an inquiry whether any retrenchment be necessary or not. The other resolutions which precede it, state it as a fact that abuses do exist, and I am unwilling to sanction such an admission by my vote, until I have some evidence that they do exist. So far as he contemplates an inquiry, I will go with the gentleman from Kentucky, but I cannot admit any loose and unsupported charges; nor am I as yet prepared to say that retrenchment is necessary—that the salaries of officers are exorbitant, and that abuses exist in the disbursement of the public money. Sir, we were told yesterday about the West Point Academy, and that the manner in which it was supported was a reflection on the present Administration. It is true that the Administration has sustained and nourished that Institution. And why so? Did the Institution originate with the present Administration? No, Sir. It was recommended by the illustrious Washington, so frequently and deservedly called the Father of his Country, was established by Congress in the second year of the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and, from first to last, has been protected and cherished by every Administration. If it be an improper establishment, and one calculated to undermine the political Institutions of the country, let not the blame be attributed to the present Administration, but to those who have gone before it. We are told by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MITCHELL] that it is a place for the education of the sons of rich men, and that the sons of poor men do not participate in its benefits. Since the remark was made by the gentleman I have inquired particularly into the facts, and I have learnt enough to satisfy me that the gentleman has been misinformed—that he is mistaken—that the appointments are distributed without regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the parent of the applicant—that the sons of the poor as well as the rich have received them—that it is enough to know that the youthful candidate is one of promise, and that the district in which he resides has not received its full complement; and these facts being established, the Secretary appoints without regard to the exploded qualification of family rank.

Sir, all impartial persons will, I think, admit, that the science of War is an important one; that it requires much application; and that, unless it is assiduously cultivated we shall ever be found unprepared to meet an enemy, and protect the honor of the nation. The many disasters which have happened to our army, have taught us impressive lessons upon this subject. The gentleman has also alluded to the recommendation of a Naval Academy, and seems to deprecate the policy. I will observe, in answer to him, that the same reasons which apply in favor of a Military Academy, apply with equal force in favor of a similar Institution for the instruction of our Naval youth. And why should they be neglected, while the youth of the Army are provided for? Has more fame been acquired on land than on the water? At least one half of the Nation's glory is the hard earnings of our gallant tars. We are told by the same gentleman, that we are here surrounded by splendor and extravagance, and that the objects and habits which entrench us on all sides, inculcate notions very different from those which we entertain at our respective homes. This may be; but, let us undertake retrenchment and reform, and prosecute the work as rigorously and efficiently as possible; we shall, after all, still find ourselves surrounded by splendor and extravagance. These things are inseparable from the seat of Government of a nation; and if we are led astray by them, the People who sent us here must apply the rod of correction, and restore us to private life, until we are restored to ourselves. Sir, it is constantly rung in our ears, that the present Administration is prodigal and wasteful; but where is the proof? What new offices have been created under it? Not one. What salaries have been raised? Not one, except that of the Postmaster General, and whose salary, as I am informed, was raised a thousand dollars higher than the recommendation of the Executive. Then why all this declamation, and all these resolutions, about the multitude of officers, and the extravagance of their salaries? Sir, I repeat it, these resolutions are an attack on the present Administration, and whether so designed or not, such is the aspect, I am well convinced, in which they will be regarded on the other side of the mountains. We are, moreover, told, that the per diem allowance received by us here, as the Representatives of the People, is too much; but if this be the fact it is surely our own fault, and the Administration are not to be blamed for it. On the score of this item of retrenchment, I am prepared to go as far as any other gentleman on this floor. In the language of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] I will go as far as he that dares go farthest. I am willing even to go so far as to do away the compensation to members altogether. But, if we are to be supported here at the public expense, it does appear to me that we ought to be furnished with such means as will enable us to live in a manner becoming the Representatives of a great People.

Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say that a general retrenchment is absolutely necessary—that there are more officers employed here than are required by the public interest. If such was the case, I am inclined to believe that the distinguished individuals at the head of the Government, would have recommended the measure. My opinion of those gentlemen is very different from that which the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOYD] appears to entertain of them. I believe them to be as intelligent, as honest, as patriotic, as any set of men at the head of any Government in the world, and that we have cause to rejoice that they are our countrymen, and have been placed at the helm. If justice should not be done them now, posterity will do them justice; but I hope, and trust, and believe, that the present age will do them justice, notwithstanding the many predictions and appearances to the contrary; and, sir, as it relates to my humble fortunes, I cheerfully and fearlessly peril them in the same barque, and am willing to sink or swim with the cause of the present Administration.

Sir, we are told by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, that this is not the accepted time for this inquiry; but I put it to the generous feelings of the House, whether, after the remarks that have been made, so well calculated to excite the suspicion of the People, and swell the clamor against the present Administration, it is right then to refuse and prohibit an inquiry? Sir, this is the accepted time; there is a crisis in our political concerns; the People are excited, and that, too, about the very matters embraced in this resolution, and justice; and generosity, our duty to ourselves and to our constituents, require that we should now fully investigate whether the present Administration be culpable or innocent.

[Mr. WRIGHT was proceeding to discuss the subject before the House, when Mr. WEEMS, of Md., rose to a question of order. The SPEAKER requested the gentleman from Ohio, to take his seat.]

Mr. WEEMS then stated that he did not consider the resolution under consideration in order, inasmuch as he thought the whole subject contained in it and the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] was embraced by a resolution he offered some days ago, which had been adopted by the House. He wished, therefore, to know from the Chair, whether the subject was now in order?

H. or R.]

The SPEAKER said that he did not consider the resolution, heretofore adopted, as covering entirely the ground embraced by the resolution and amendment now under consideration. It was, however, a question of consistency, which belonged rather to the decision of the House, than the Chair. If the Speaker were permitted, at least on doubtful cases, to draw questions of consistency within the vortex of order, he might usurp a negative upon important propositions, and thereby suppress, instead of subserve, the legislative will. Such was the Lex Parliamentaria. The Chair, therefore, pronounced the resolution in order, and the gentleman from Ohio entitled to the floor.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he owed it to the subject to express his satisfaction that this matter had been introduced into the House, and, said Mr. W. I may be permitted, I hope, to congratulate the country on the auspicious prospects which now appear to attend the proposed enquiry. So long ago, sir, as the 18th of May, 1826, I presented to the House a proposition having in view the same object with that avowed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON.] A reference to the Journal of that day will show a proposition introduced by me, to amend the rules of the House, so as to raise a standing committee on retrenchment, whose express duty it should be to examine into the mode and manner in which business was transacted in the various public offices, to ascertain any abuses that existed, and suggest the proper remedies, and propose measures calculated to promote economy in the transaction of public affairs. The proposition met with little favor then, and I was unable to get it off from the table. I am glad to see many gentlemen, from whom I then received neither aid nor countenance, anxious to promote the measure now. I then preferred a general Standing Committee, because, in looking over the duties assigned to the various committees of the House, I was afraid that this, as I then thought, and still think, important subject, would be neglected by committees charged with so many other duties. At the last session of Congress, sir, thinking that, if I directed my efforts to one single subject, I might be more successful, I offered a resolution directing an enquiry into the expenditure of the contingent fund of this House. In looking over the items of expenditure connected with it, I thought many of them extravagant and unnecessary, conducing more to the convenience of members than to the advancement of the public interest. I thought retrenchment ought to be made, and that it was proper the work should begin here, in this House. This project failed, as did the other. I am really gratified that the subject is now here under different auspices, and that the present proposition meets much more favor than either of mine did.

I have, sir, still another cause to congratulate myself that this subject is introduced in the House at this time, and under the present auspices. The present President of the United States has recommended it to your consideration in his two last messages. This shows the subject is not a new one, brought forward for the first time by the gentleman from Kentucky. The President, in his message to Congress, in December, 1826, says: "It is well for us, however, to be admonished of the necessity of abiding by the maxims of the most vigilant economy, and of resorting to all honorable and useful expedients, for pursuing, with steady and inflexible perseverance, the total discharge of the debt." In the message of December, 1827, he says: "The deep solicitude felt by all classes throughout the Union, for the total discharge of the public debt, will apologize for the earnestness with which I deem it my duty to urge this topic upon the consideration of Congress, of recommending to them again the strictest economy in the application of the public funds."

Sir, if we really wish to retrench the public expenditures, and reform existing abuses, we have reason to felicitate ourselves on the prospect of doing something; and I have reason to be satisfied that a measure which, when brought forward by me, wholly failed to find favor, and which, when earnestly and repeatedly recommended to our consideration by our present excellent and vigilant Chief Magistrate, under the injunctions of the Constitution, could not attract the attention of the House, or draw out one friend of economy and reform in its favor, has now drawn to its support the aid of many gentlemen, from different sides of the House. I hope something will now be done. I have supposed that, in some of the many public offices to which the business of the nation is consigned, there are extravagancies and abuses that need remedy; but I owe it to candor to say, I am unable to say precisely where the extravagance or the abuses can be found. I want the subject enquired into by a competent committee, and fully probed to the bottom. Give us information and light, and if reform be needed, let us reform. I entertain the opinion that this duty would be better performed by the able, experienced, and diligent Committee of Ways and Means, than by any Select Committee which may be raised, composed, probably, of new members. Gentlemen must be more fortunate than I have been, if, in visiting the offices on business, they can find their way through the different official ramifications of the offices; and they will, I fear, make slow progress in searching for abuses where they are ignorant of the routine of business. If gentlemen will advert to the duties devolved by the rule of the House on the Committee of Ways and Means, they will find that, among other things, that committee is required "to inquire into the state of the public debt, of the revenue, and of the expenditures, and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon; and to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with those laws; and also, to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments, and the accountability of their officers." This committee, then, is the proper committee; its members are familiar with the whole subject, many of them are old members; they have long contemplated the whole routine of public business in the offices, and can act speedily and efficiently. They know where to strike; from them I should expect something; but I should not feel the same confidence in a Select Committee. I hope, therefore, the reference will be to that Committee; but if that is refused, I will vote for a Select Committee.

Sir, it has become fashionable, in various parts of the House, for gentlemen to rise and proclaim their desire to do the public business and go home; and I will avail myself of this occasion, lest I should not be favored with another, to say, that it is also my desire to do the public business and return home. I am willing to engage in doing the public business, and work at it, and when done, to go home. But I am not willing to go home before we have made some effort to do the public business, even if we fail in accomplishing it. What have we done? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has told us the session is half over. We have passed a law appropriating money to pay ourselves, but what else have we done? Let gentlemen examine into the business done, and they will find we have passed no other act. Let us not go home and leave the public business, but do it, and then talk of going home. If I understand the gentleman right, (and I always listen to him with plea-ire,) he avowed himself favorable to retrenchment and reform, but thought it not the accepted time to engage in that work. Why is it not the accepted time? If I seek an answer in the remarks of the gentleman, I find nothing but the observations alluded to, that the session was half through, and we ought to do the public business and go home. Is the gentleman content that we defer from this that retrenchment and reform is not the public business? Surely he would not admit that. We have done nothing—there must be some public business done before we go home. What are we to do? This, sir, is public business—let us engage in it. Let us retrench—ferret out abuses, if any exist—and reform. The gentleman has declared that he is no friend to the Administration. I declare I am a friend to the Administration; and I am for engaging in this measure—which has been repeatedly pressed upon us by the President—and correcting any abuses that shall be found to exist. I will go with the gentleman in this work. Begin the inquiry; and if we are unable to accomplish our object before the close of the session, I will go farther, and empower the committee to send for persons and papers, and allow them to sit here during the whole recess of Congress, if necessary, that we may have the information at the commencement of the next session of Congress, in time to act on it then. Let us go to work, and stick to it from morning till night, and try to do some of the business before us.

AN. 25, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] also says, now is not the accepted time to engage in this investigation, or to adopt measures for retrenching the public expenditures. He has given us one reason why this is not the accepted time. He has another object—one of much greater importance—an object requiring his every effort—to which he would look with a single eye: and in order to do that one thing well, he would not engage in this—he would do but one thing at a time. The gentleman did not tell us what that object was that called for his single and undivided exertions; but he used language in reference to it which no one could misunderstand. I will not say, sir, that the object referred to as requiring the entire effort of himself and friends, was, to pull down the present Administration; but I will say, I so understood his remarks. I will not say the object of the gentleman is not meritorious; far be it from me to judge any man's merits or motives; but I may say, that, if I were to engage in such a work, it would not, with me, be meritorious. I should esteem it meritorious to engage in the work of reform—of ferreting out and exposing the abuses, if any exist, of the officers of Government; but for me to engage in pulling down the Administration first, and then hunt out and expose the abuses they had been guilty of, would be a work of no merit. If your officers do wrong, show that to the People, and they will turn them out: but do not pull them down without some evidence of abuse. Sir, the gentleman from Virginia has proclaimed that there are many abuses and extravagancies that ought to be remedied: and yet now was not the proper time to apply the remedy. But why this is not the proper time, we are not told.

If abuses exist, we cannot be too soon in applying the remedy. The course of the gentleman from Virginia, over the way, to my understanding, is inconsistent. Why not go to work now, and find out these abuses?

[Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, enquired if the gentleman from Ohio meant him. Mr. WRIGHT replied, he did not; but he would attend to the gentleman in a short time.]

Sir, said Mr. WRIGHT, if abuses exist, if retrenchment is necessary, why did the gentleman from Virginia vote to lay this resolution on the table, with the avowed object of putting an end to the enquiry? To me this appears inconsistent; but it is not for me to reconcile the gentleman's course with consistency.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL] told us that the mover of these resolutions was fresh from the People, and fresh from the oven of public opinion. I am glad, sir, that, coming fresh from the oven, he retained, when he took his seat here, sufficient heat to introduce this subject to our consideration, under the new era of which he had heard. I hope he will have heat and perseverance enough to carry it through. The gentleman from Tennessee had also gone into an examination of himself, and disclosed his experience to the House. He had spoken of his sense of shame, resulting from the conviction that he had been growing worse ever since he came here, and more estranged from his constituents by the extravagance and splendor that surrounded him. Sir, I regret his deterioration, but I hope this self examination, to which he has been excited by the condition and course of the gentleman from Kentucky, the mover of these resolutions, will be serviceable to him, and so warm him up, that he may unite in pushing this enquiry, that, when he returns to the People, or the oven of public opinion, he may be able, from the light and knowledge he obtains, to remove any prejudices he may find among his constituents and the People of his part of the Union, against the present Administration, as to any charges of profligate and extravagant expenditures of the public treasures. I will now attend to the gentleman from Virginia, over the way, [Mr. FLOYD.] No, sir, before I do so, I have one other remark to make to the gentleman from Tennessee. He has told us, sir, that the officers employed in administering the affairs of this Government exceeded nine thousand, and has emphatically asked if this is not evidence of our departure from Republican simplicity? The gentleman would have been less likely to have been misunderstood by the country, if, in speaking of this great number of officers, he had remembered to inform us that between seven and eight thousand of them were Deputy Postmasters, employed all over the country in diffusing information, light, and knowledge, the foundation and support of free Government. The residue may be more than our Government requires; but I am not able, with my present information, to say what offices should be dispensed with.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOYD] had said there were a good many offices that might be abolished, and a great deal of expenditure. He has not told what offices.

[Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and asked Mr. W. to give him the floor. Mr. W. said he would yield it for the purpose of explanation. Mr. R. said he wished it for that purpose, and Mr. W. yielded. Mr. RANDOLPH: I wish the gentleman from Ohio to say if he means me.]

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not mean the gentleman; I mean the gentleman entirely over the way. I should have taken it kindly, if the gentleman had informed us what offices could be abolished—a few of the many he had spoken of. I should have taken it kindly, if the gentleman had advised us of some of the great deal of useless expenditure to which he referred. It was easy to make general charges—many such had been made. I want particulars. What office can be abolished? What expenditure is too great? I believe there may be some. I am anxious to know where, and how we can apply the remedy. I do not find the information in the remarks of the gentleman on the Tacubaya mission. I had feared, from the vote of yesterday, on the proposition to lay on the table, in which I find the vote of the gentleman from Virginia, entirely over the way, in the affirmative, that he would go with us in the work of retrenchment; but he tells you this morning, that this is the accepted time to engage in this good work. The gentleman tells us a new era has commenced, and we are about to feel all the calamities that can be heaped upon the People. I am at a loss to know to what the gentleman alludes. Is it to the change that took place in this House at the commencement of this session? Is that the new era that is to bring down upon the People this great weight of calamity? I had hoped better things of this new era. That we were to have reform, retrenchment, all the abuses of the public offices hunted out, exposed, and corrected; that the People were to be no longer visited by calamity, but have blessings showered down upon them. I hope I have not been mistaken in the good that was to follow this new era. I agree, sir, with the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BLAKE] that we are approaching an important crisis in the political affairs of the country, and all are desirous of knowing if the President and heads of Departments are abusing the trust confided to them—if they are profligate in the public expenditures. Nay, I think there is a peculiar fitness and propriety in sifting this matter now—many charges had been made against the incumbents of office, of prodigality and waste.

The Chief Magistrate was a candidate for re-election; the People should be informed if these charges are true. An issue is made up and submitted to the decision of the People, and before they are called on to pronounce the guilt or innocence of this officer, they should be furnished with the evidence—all the evidence on the subject. The gentleman from Virginia, entirely over the way, [Mr. FLORN] supposes the friends of the Administration are opposed to retrenchment, and to the reduction of the public debt. Sir, I know of no such opposition of the friends of the Administration. No one has avowed any such feelings. The supposition is groundless, altogether gratuitous. The friends of the Administration are friendly to retrenchment: but if they were not, if any friend were opposed, I have shown in the extracts I have read, that the Cabinet and President are in favor of both. The gentleman has adverted to the subject of internal improvement and the tariff. He seems to think these measures fraught with calamity to the People, and he invokes the Representatives from the agricultural States of the South and the West to unite and arrest these measures. Sir, I represent a part of the agricultural People of the West, to whom that gentleman adverts. They do not agree with the gentleman in the fears he expresses, or his opinion, that every act of legislation on the tariff lessens the price of their products, and increases the price of every manufactured article necessarily compels them to buy. Appealing to the knowledge resulting from the experience of the country, they believe the more you protect the manufacturer, the more you multiply the consumers of the agricultural products, and by increasing the demand in the home market, you increase the price of the products of the former. On the other hand, that, in proportion as you protect and encourage the manufacture of those necessarily compels the former to buy, the more you reduce by the home competition the price of the articles—such has been the case with cotton cloths, and such they think would be the case with other cloths. The fears of my constituents as to the tariff, are not of the same kind with those expressed by the gentleman—they are of an entire different kind. They fear lest, not only this entire month, but this entire session, will pass away, before we even hear from our Committee of Manufactures; they fear nothing from the passage of a tariff bill that they desire, and have prayed for, and will continue to pray for.

Sir, we have been told of great extravagances and of many abuses—but no one has been specified. I regret that this is not the case. Tell us where the abuses are to be found—what officer's salary should be reduced. Is it that of the Postmaster General? Will any gentleman say his salary is too great a compensation for the various and arduous duties devolved upon him? If they do, let them satisfy me of the fact, and I will unite to reduce his pay. But how can the Administration be chargeable with waste and extravagance? They can expend no money except on the appropriations of Congress; and what laws have we passed, since the commencement of the present Administration, to increase expenditures or salaries, except that of the Postmaster General? I recollect none. If then there is waste, and profligacy, and extravagance, it originates and continues here. Point out the extravagant object, and withhold the appropriation. We are to blame—we hold the purse strings of the nation, and I am not disposed to surrender them, and we can close and open the purse at pleasure. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLORN] speaks of visionary and extravagant projects. Does he rank among the visionary and extravagant projects that introduced by himself, to establish a new Government at the mouth of the Columbia, or Oregon river? I formerly went with him in favor of that bill, but he says so much of visionary schemes, that I begin to doubt if that be not one.

Sir, I repeat my sincere desire that we may proceed to apply all our disposable means to the reduction of the public debt, as far as our contracts will allow us to redeem, and go on in the work of economy and retrenchment—ferret out abuses, expose and correct them. I wish, to be sure, gentlemen had been more specific, for who can tell now, after the debate, where the alleged abuses exist, any more than he could tell before it began. I cannot: but I am for going on with the work, in order to find and to cure them if they exist. I have done.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved to amend the amendment proposed by Mr. TAYLOR yesterday, by striking out all after the word "that," with which it commences, and inserting as follows:

"The Committee on Public Expenditures be directed to examine into the manner in which the moneys appropriated to defray the expenses of foreign intercourse have been expended, and that the Committees on the several Executive Departments be directed to inquire into the manner in which the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of those Departments have been expended; and that the said several Committees do make special report to this House, as far as they can ascertain the facts touching the matters before stated."

In support of this amendment, Mr. McDUFFIE said, it was with no affectation he declared his sincere regret at the introduction of this matter, and at the course the discussion of it had taken. I was fully convinced, from the beginning, said Mr. McD. that no subject could be stirred in this House, bearing either directly or indirectly on the two great parties militant now in the field of political warfare, that would not interfere most injuriously with the appropriate legislative business of Congress. It was this conviction that caused me to do every thing in my power to arrest this debate at its commencement, and to regret that the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] to lay the resolution on the table—a regret in which, I have no doubt, the House must, by this time, participate—did not prevail. But we have now fully got into the discussion. All attempts to avoid it have been defeated by the concurrence of both sides of the House; and so far as it can be considered a party question, a portion of both parties appear to have rushed into it. So far as my conduct is concerned—whether as it relates to my duties as a Representative of the People, or as a member of a party—I would have it distinctly understood that I shall, in this matter, act upon my own grounds and upon my own opinions.

In the first place, then, I think it proper to say, that I do not regard it as becoming the dignity of this House, or as consistent with the public interest, which it is our special duty to promote, to entertain jurisdiction of any question which is either intended or calculated to have a political bearing upon either of the two parties that now divide the country. Unfortunately for the public interest, we have too much reason to apprehend the undue and improper infusion of party politics into the discussion of those legislative measures which it is our duty to consider. Under this impression, I entered upon the business of this Congress with a fixed purpose of avoiding any reference to this Administration, farther than was indispensably necessary to the proper discharge of my duty in relation to those public measures which belong to the legislation of Congress. But, sir, I presume I shall obtain credit when I say that, if it shall ever become my duty to make any movement here tending to implicate this Administration, I shall openly and distinctly avow my purpose. Believing it, however, to be incompatible with the interest of the country to carry on this discussion, either for the purpose of inculcating or exculpating the Administration, I sincerely hope it will be speedily terminated: for, as to any other object, it must evidently end in nothing. No practical result can possibly grow out of it the present session. With regard to the number of officers existing under this Government, and the salaries they now enjoy, I would remark, in the first place, that the present Administration cannot be fairly made responsible, but to a very small extent, for the one or the other. The offices were created, with a few exceptions, and their salaries fixed by law, before this Administration came into power. A proposition to limit the number of these officers, or to curtail their salaries, ought not, therefore, to be debated as a question affecting the present incumbents of the Executive Government. That certainly is not the point of their responsibility. On the subject of the proposed retrenchments, I differ entirely from the mover of the original resolution. The true mode of effecting reforms really and extensively beneficial to the country, is not by lopping off public officers with an indiscriminating hand, and curtailing salaries without a due regard to the importance of the duties for which they are paid. This is at best but a very small business. No saving worth the discussion could be effected by it. If any thing salutary is to be done, it must be a general and systematic reform of the system which regulates and controls the disbursement of the public money. An effective system of responsibility might save millions in the public expenditures; I make this general remark without any reference to the actual operations of the Government, so far as they are connected with the present Administration. But I will state for the information of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CHILTON) and for the purpose of illustrating the view I am presenting, that there are two of the Executive Departments, as well organized, both with reference to the efficient performance of the duties belonging to them, and to the strict observance of economy in the disbursement of the public money, as any Departments ever were organized in any Government on earth. I refer, sir, to the Department of War and that of the General Post Office. Yes, sir, it is susceptible of the clearest demonstration, the system of strict accountability introduced into the War Department by the late Secretary of War, effected an annual saving of at least one million of dollars in the expenses of the Military Establishment, independent of the reduction of the Army. The improvements introduced into the Post Office Department, have added, in a manner not less striking, to its usefulness and economy. Since that Department was committed to the management of the excellent, and able, and faithful officer who now presides over it, an increase of half a million of dollars has been added to its annual revenue, while the facilities for the transmission of intelligence by the mail, throughout every portion of the Union, have been increased two or three fold. And how, sir, were these signal improvements effected? By diminishing the number of the officers connected with those departments? So far from this being the case, the number of officers was as much increased as was necessary for a proper distribution of duties and division of responsibility. To each officer was assigned his appropriate duty, and the officer whose duty it was to control and check the disbursing officers, had no agency in making the disbursement. To the complete success of this system in the Post Office Department, a considerable increase of clerks has been indispensable. And I was informed the other day by the Postmaster General, that one single clerk had been the means of saving fifty thousand dollars, I think, in the postage of newspapers alone. What are we to infer from these facts on the subject we are discussing? I will tell you sir. As it is apparent that no beneficial reforms have ever yet been introduced that did not proceed from the chief officers of the Executive Departments, so may we justly infer, that no important improvements ever will, or ever can be made, without at least the aid and co-operation of those officers. If we have not at the head of those Departments, able, efficient, and practical men—men, Sir, who have a talent for business—I will not say for action, lest I should be misconstrued, as on another occasion, to mean military action—unless in a word, we have men eminently qualified, not only to talk about public business, but to do it successfully, it will be in vain for this House to attempt any thing like a beneficial reform in relation to the expenditure of the public money. It must be obvious, I think, from these views of the subject, that it will never answer any good purpose, to go blindfold into the business of reform, cutting off indiscriminately this officer and that, without a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the whole system, and the relation which the officers in question bear to that system. So far therefore, as the resolution of the honorable member from Kentucky proposes a reduction of officers, or a decrease of their salaries, and that seems to be its principal aim, I repeat my opinion, that the inquiry must end in nothing. We should only send a committee of this House a tilting against shadows. With what consistency, Sir, could any committee of this House recommend a reduction of the number of Executive officers, when, at the very last session, Congress authorized, by law, an increase of the number employed in almost every one of the Executive Departments? I cannot, therefore, consent to indulge the peculiar views of any member on either side of the House so far as to consume the time of this House, which ought to be devoted to the ordinary business of the session, in what must evidently prove to be an unprofitable inquiry, and worse than an unprofitable discussion. I have no idea, Sir, of converting this Hall into an arena for conducting a political canvass. A few words, Sir, with regard to the amendment I have offered.

AN. 25, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

It appears, from the very large vote recently given against laying the resolution on the table, including both parties, that the House deem an inquiry necessary and proper. The friends of the Administration seem to regard such an inquiry necessary to exonerate the Administration from the imputations supposed to be cast upon them. Now, I am clearly of the opinion, that, if we go into an inquiry at all, it should not be mere children's play. If we are to prosecute an inquiry into the alleged or the possible abuses of the Government, let us direct that inquiry, specifically, to those parts of the system where such abuses are most likely to occur. Though I never will sanction the injustice of making this Administration responsible for the extent of the peace establishment, civil and military; yet the application of the various contingent funds placed at their disposal, is a very different matter. I perceive the gentlemen on the other side of the House are very prompt to meet this as an attack on the present Administration, and to insist upon an inquiry, with a view to their defence and exculpation. I would suggest to those gentlemen, that, if their object is to whitewash the Administration, they can accomplish it only by giving the inquiry a direction such as I have proposed. All the other points of inquiry that have been suggested, are perfectly immaterial, so far as this Administration is concerned. But if there has been anything extravagant or improper in the application of the contingent fund, they ought to be held responsible for it. I have no knowledge, as to the manner in which this fund has been employed, particularly as relates to diplomatic agents and messengers sent abroad. I have, however, seen it repeatedly stated in the public prints—and I can make the matter no more notorious by stating it here, or I would not state it—that a distinguished editor of a newspaper in Virginia, received from the contingent fund about 1700 dollars, for going to Buenos Ayres on public business, when, in fact he went to Europe on his own. Abuses of this kind, if they exist, ought surely to be exposed and corrected. If they do not exist, it is due to the officers implicated, that the truth should be presented in an authentic form to the public. I think the contingent fund a very proper subject of investigation, without any reference to alleged abuses. There should be an annual scrutiny by the committees of this House into the application of all the contingent funds, and the scrutiny cannot be too minute. Sir, I was anxious to get rid of this subject altogether; but, as it has been forced upon us from all sides of the House, I can consent to it only in the specific and practical form indicated in the amendment I have submitted.

Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Chair. That has arrived (said he) which must have been foreseen by every member yesterday, whether he voted for or against the motion to lay this resolution on the table. This House is converted into an electioneering arena. I should not, permit me to say before I go any farther, have inquired of the gentleman from Ohio "over the way"—I will not say out of the way—at which of the two gentlemen from Virginia who had spoken on this subject he levelled his remarks, if he had not responded to the inquiry of my colleague that he did not intend them for him: and, as at my call he declares that he did not intend them for me, I leave it to that other gentleman from Virginia, whoever he may be, who has spoken on this debate, to take them to himself.

[Here Mr. WRIGHT asked permission to explain—but Mr. RANDOLPH refused to yield the floor for that purpose.]

But, (continued Mr. R.) if the gentleman meant my colleague, [Mr. FLORENCE] to my colleague I relegate the gentleman, being well satisfied that he could not be in better hands. Yes, Sir, with this thing I have done forever. I will not be provoked, nor will I suffer myself to be induced to enter into personalities with any man upon this floor; but I do know that the newspapers have it in their power, and, whether designedly or not, they do exercise that power, of giving to my remarks a pungency and an application, which, as made by me, they were divested of—I refer now to a late and notorious occasion.

And now, Sir, let me call the attention of the House to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, and the peculiar state of things in which we are. I will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, but, if it is adopted, I shall vote against the resolution, as amended. I was sent here to discharge the duties of a Representative to the best of my ability, for the good of those whom I represent; and that duty I shall discharge, undeterred by calls of yeas and nays, and by the bug bears and hob-goblins which may be conjured up of any supposed responsibility—undismayed by any fear of imputations of suppressing inquiry, or of conniving at public abuses—insensible to any imputations of throwing out against Government charges which I am not prepared to establish. I shall vote against the resolution, fearless of consequences, and the motives upon which I vote I will avow to my constituents, and in the face of the world. I have never yet refused to do so, under much more trying circumstances than the present—for, in proportion as the atmosphere presents nothing but clouds and darkness to the view of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BLAKE] so to me the aspect of it exhibits indications of returning sunshine. No, Sir, I shall not be deterred. I shall do whatever I think right—and when I say so, I do not say that others will not—far from it—I will not vote for any proposition, whether from friend or from foe, which I think calculated to injure the great cause of the People of these United States. No, Sir, no gloss that can be given to my words, no coloring whatever that may be put upon my conduct, shall induce me to say aye when I am inclined to say no, or no when my feelings prompt me to say aye. I may stand alone. I have been in small minorities under the first of the present dynasty, and I have been in a minority under the second, and it is very possible I may be in a minority now—but that will make no difference to me.

Sir, it is a received maxim of the common law, drawn from the only fountain of wisdom, experience, (and the experience of ages) that no man shall be trusted to try his own cause, or be a witness in his own case. It is on the application of that wise and salutary maxim to our present situation, that I say no to this inquiry. I say no. The gentleman from Indiana has told us that, for his part, he is willing to sink or to swim with the Administration. He has nailed his colors to the mast. Sir, I admire his gallantry, but he must pardon me if I have no wish to sink along with him, or, what is worse, to sink the cause in which I am embarked against him, by agreeing to any measure, prudent or imprudent, concerted or unconcerted, matured or precipitate, which any new or any old member may throw into this House. I say to that gentleman, and to others, that, as soon as they give us the helm, we are responsible, and not before, for the safety of the ship. But I will not consent to inflate her sails—I will not consent to impel her canvas—I will not consent to work like a galley slave at pulling the oar, while she has a helmsman who may at any time he pleases run her on a shoal, and make me responsible for the result. No, Sir, I will be content to wait. I will wait, Sir, until a factious majority of the People of the United States, who have returned a factious majority to the other House, and as I hope to this also, shall have elected a factious President. Sir, you had scarcely taken your seat in that chair, before one of the master spirits of the times sneeringly said to us, I wish you joy, you are now the majority in both Houses, and you are responsible for the measures of Government. I cry you mercy, Master Stephen, I cry you mercy—we are not, and do not mean to be thus responsible; and for that very reason, because we do not, I shall vote against this measure, and against any other out of the ordinary routine of business, that may be brought up. Sir, with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] I am for masks off. And now what do you mean to do? Do you mean, as the gentleman from South Carolina said, to send to a man, who is both witness and judge in his own case—and in using this language, it may be said that I am making imputations against illustrious and great men, to whom the People of the United States, and a just posterity, and even the present age, will not fail to do justice. Sir, I do no such thing—I make no other implication than that which every free and wise People make against our common nature—I do say, it would be requiring more of parties implicated, than can justly be demanded from human nature, and therefore at least as much as can fairly be demanded of them, to ask them to decide in this case. You are requiring men, whose political existence hangs by a single hair, and who have already the risus Sardonius of political death upon their countenance—for it was with a Sardonian sneer that we were told that we had become responsible for the measures of the Government; you are required to call upon them to do any thing which may have an effect to hasten that event. Sir, I will do no such thing. I will not call upon them. And why not? Because I may, by possibility, by that call, put it in their power to protract a little longer their political lives. I say by possibility; and that is a possibility which I am determined to avoid. No, Sir; if this House is to be converted into a political arena, and I shall be accused as one of the gladiators, whether the man with the trident or him with the net, I do not say, I am clear that we should so speak that every man, woman, and child in the United States, shall be able to understand our drift. I then shall call upon the present men in power for nothing that can, directly or indirectly, enable them in the smallest degree to affect the great question which is now at issue between them and the People of the United States, in which, as interested parties, I will take none of their evidence that I can avoid.

I believe I have, by this time, pretty well explained my object. Sir, what should we have said, thirty years ago, of one of that party, to which I had the honor to belong, as the youngest and most humble member, if he had brought forward a proposition, unconsulting and unconsulted, which might give the adverse party some color to their sinking cause, and put it in their power to live one more term? But, sir, I have another objection to the resolution. The public mind is in a state of excitement, such as must ever exist on the eve of a great political battle. And, Sir, I should as soon look for perfect calmness and composure on the eve of a battle of another sort, or rather after the fight has begun, as that such an investigation should now be conducted with that patience and deliberation which it demands. Sir, the adverse party would gladly catch at such a resolution. In the time to which I have referred, the ruling party, for they held their majority in both Houses to the last, did catch at some such straws: they were drowning men—drowned they are. I had intended to have said something as to the challenges so boldly made, to point out the offices that ought to be abolished, and the expenditures which ought to be retrenched. But I feel my strength unequal to my purpose. But I must say, that in the affair of the Panama (since called the Tacubaya) mission, not only new offices were created, but new doctrines were started in reference to the Executive prerogative, which were wholly unknown to the Constitution and to the practice of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate; and I will tell my worthy colleague, [Mr. FLOYD] if he will permit me, that there has been an improvement on his plan of sending Ministers abroad, and bringing them back when they have finished their business: for they are now sent abroad on sleeveless errands, that they may come back, re infecta, to pocket their emoluments. Is not this the fact? Sir, we have had (to say nothing of Tacubaya) two missions to England under this Administration: one of them was a complete abortion; and as to the other, what has it done for the public good? what object has it accomplished? We were told by the very accurate gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] whom I always hear with pleasure, that these missions were justified* on the ground that the acquisition of South-America had created a swarm—I believe that was the word—of Diplomatic appointments. So much the worse for us, sir. Are we, whenever a nation, great or small, changes its relations to another nation, and becomes independent of that other nation, instantly to send off Ambassadors to it? Are we to make use of the incident as a pretext for increasing that patronage which all profess to wish to diminish? But we are told that the President has recommended to us economy and retrenchment. Yes, sir, he did recommend them, in one of those lofty generalities with which all sermons, political or religious, abound, which might be printed in blank, like law process, and filled as occasion might require. But I, sir, am for looking at the practices, and not the precepts of the parson, political or religious. I suppose, sir, our good friends the Greeks—yes, sir, suppose that the Greek—who is Græculus cauriens, the same animal now that he was in the time of Juvenal, except that he is less enlightened and refined—should succeed in throwing off the Turkish yoke—"the faith-keeping Turk"—I suppose we must have an Ambassador sent to every islet and nest of pirates in the Ægean, sir—we must send one to Hydra—one to the Continent—and one, I presume, to each of the Cyclades. So that, if my friend from Virginia, who is a medical man, will permit me the phrase, the disease, instead of being contagious, will be sporadic—as, indeed, it now is—and highly malignant.

Sir, I have never seen but one Administration, which, seriously, and in good faith, was disposed to give up its patronage, and was willing to go farther than Congress, or even the People themselves, so far as Congress represents their feelings, desired—and that was the first administration of Thomas Jefferson. He, sir, was the only man I ever knew or heard of, who really, truly, and honestly, not only said "nolo episcopari," but actually refused the mitre. It was a part of my duty, and one of the most pleasant parts of public duty that I ever performed, under his recommendation—not because he recommended it, thank God!—to move, in this House, to relieve the public at once from the whole burden of that system of internal taxation, the practical effect of which was, whatever might have been its object, to produce patronage rather than revenue. He, too, had really at heart, and showed it by his conduct, the reduction of the national debt, and that in the only mode by which it ever can be reduced, by lessening the expenses of the Government till they are below its receipts. Sir, there is no witchcraft in that—no, sir—no witchcraft at all—no more in paying a public than a private debt. You may have sinking funds, as many as you please, and never so vast a financial apparatus; but, if you spend more than you have, you will be in debt to the end of the world. Sir, so far from fearing any injurious effect from the too rapid payment of the national debt, I would pay the three per cent's now—Yes, sir, I would pay them at par, if necessary—for it could only prove that money is worth but three per cent. Sir, I was the humble instrument of introducing the first efficient sinking fund, by setting apart a given sum of $7,300,000, which ever operated to reduce the national debt. When that debt was increased by the acquisition of Louisiana—aye, sir, the acquisition of Louisiana!—and who was for and who was against it then?—who pronounced the acquisition unconstitutional, and declared, in the other House, that we had no right to tax the People of that country?—the sinking fund was then raised to eight millions. Since that time, owing to the debt created by the expenses of the war, it has been raised to ten millions. The gentleman from New-York [Mr. TAY-

* Mr. RANDOLPH did not mean to be understood as saying that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] justified the "Missions," but the office here charged with the business which those missions created. Neither did he mean to express himself, that the measures of the Republican Party, in the Seventh Congress, were thwarted—but that, notwithstanding their labors were directed to the alleviation of the public burthens, and that they were a decided majority, they would have been thwarted by a disciplined minority, if they had not acted upon consultation, and in concert, to which they were compelled by their opponents to resort.—Note by Mr. R.

son] himself admitted—and I thank him for it—he was obliged to admit it, and therefore, perhaps, my debt of gratitude is the less—that the sinking fund has not been faithfully applied to its object. Sir, I said, in some hasty remarks, when the gentleman interrupted my colleague, [Mr. FLEMING] that applying surplus balances to make up what had been pillaged from the sinking fund, was robbing Peter to pay Paul. No, sir, it is no such thing—it is robbing Peter to pay Peter—it is robbing the sinking fund to pay the sinking fund: for, as it has been over and over again said, the sinking fund has not only a right to its own modicum of $10,000,000, but it is residuary legatee besides; it takes all the surplus, whatever that may be, as its own, and you never can give it any thing in return for that of which you rob it, except out of that surplus which was already its own. Can't give it any more. Your giving surplus balances to eke out the sinking fund, is nothing more than like the false guardian, who, when he comes to settle his accounts, pays off his debts to his ward with the money out of which he has cheated him.

We are asked by the gentlemen, why do you not specify? Particularize! particularize! Shew us the particulars! You give us a sum total without any items, as Mr. Sterling says in the play. Will the gentleman have one? Sir, I will give you one of them. The House will give me that credit which I demand. It is only my due. I did state that, if we begin this system of reform, it ought to begin, like modern charity, at home. Sir, I never pretended that the House was not answerable for abuses as well as any other branch of the Government. Now for one item of them. Sir, at the first session I was on this floor—it was the last Congress of the first Mr. Adams—whether this will be the last of the second I cannot say—I find this item in the list of appropriations: For the expenses of fire-wood, stationary, printing, and all other contingent expenses of Congress, twenty-one thousand six hundred and sixty-four dollars and forty cents. The sum, Sir, covered the expenses of both Houses, and included besides, the extraordinary expense and furnishing each member with a complete copy of the Journals of the old Congress. This House then consisted of one hundred and two members, one only of whom I see now left, [Mr. LIVINGSTON.] Now, we have 213 members. Then, according to the rule which has been introduced into this House—Sir, by the simple rule of three, if 102 gives so much, what ought 213 to give? This item, be it remembered, included the expenses of the other body, but I shall confine myself now to the expenses of this body alone. For the present year the total estimate for the contingent expenses of this House now differs but a trifle from ninety thousand dollars, of which, I am justified in saying, fifty thousand is for printing alone; and I have no hesitation in saying, Sir, if the British Parliament paid for their printing by the same rule that we do, it is not five hundred thousand dollars—which we are told exceeds the whole annual expenses of Congress—but that is not my statement, remember—that will defray their printer's bill. No, Sir, and it is not for me to say what would defray it. I happen to have had an opportunity of seeing a good deal of the printing of the British Parliament. It is not made up, like ours, of title pages and blanks, and broadsides of every thing and any thing—motions, petitions, bills, reports, resolutions, amendments, and every matter which can be brought into the House of Commons. No, sir, they go on and print closely; and where one line ends, another begins, (I make no allowance for the high rates of living and wages in that country;) but I will let the House into the fact, that when the rate of printing for this body was settled, a printer—a worthy and honest man, as I believe—was a member of Congress. I speak from the information of one of the first men in the country. The rate was fixed during the depreciation of paper money, which I described yesterday when every thing brought ten prices, and it has remained not unsettled. No, Sir, for it has been regularly settled and paid ever since. It has remained, from that time to this, at the same rate—though one dollar now will buy as much of land, slaves, every article from which we draw subsistence, as four dollars would buy then. To illustrate this, I will state a fact. A gentleman, whom I knew, owning a fertile, but, as he thought, an unhealthy tract of land, on the Roanoke, sold it, and purchased a small tract, on which he built a house that cost him five thousand dollars, and that sum will build what is considered a first rate house in my part of the country. The land itself was not good, nor was it bid. It was what is called fair land. The state of his affairs, like that of many of his neighbors, soon obliged him to sell, and he sold the land, without any allowance for the improvements, for three dollars an acre. An acquaintance of mine was tempted, by the lowness of price, to purchase the farm; thus verifying the maxim of Poor Richard—that he who buys what he does not want, always buys it dear: and so it turned out in this case. If he wished to sell it now, he could not get his money back. This single fact was worth all declamation in the world. In the same quarter of the country, land (some of it good wood land) has sold for one dollar per acre!

Sir, I have not done with this subject of the public printing, and the price paid for it. I do not mean to worry the House. It is well known to the members of this House (and I hope what I now say will be taken down verbatim, if possible)—that the public printers of this House are also the editors of the most extensive—I mean in point of superficial content—the most extensive journal in the United States, and one which, from having been hitherto considered as possessing a sort of at least demi-official character—something like the Moniteur, in Paris, but not exactly—and from observing, or rather professing to observe, a strict neutrality, had obtained a most extensive circulation at home, and by far the most extensive abroad, of any paper in this country. Now, sir, we also know, that this journal is our main stay and reliance for the reports of our debates, and the proceedings of this House. Sir, I make no inference, farther than to say—I do not say that the political existence of these people hangs upon the event of the next election—the thread of their existence, like that of the gentleman from Indiana, is connected with that election—they sink with the Administration, having abandoned their professed neutrality, if it sinks; and if it does not, they will certainly swim. I make no more imputations on them than that they have $50,000 per annum staked on the event—on a single card.

If the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina shall prevail, if I understand the matter of it, this item of expenditure ought to be included, as one over which we have complete control. I beg pardon, I should have suggested this before, but I knew that there was a committee of the House whose duty it was to audit its accounts, and to see that no improper items are admitted. I have pointed out one abuse, and I have done it where it was proper to point it out, at home. Sir, I have known of the existence of these evils for a long time. They were no secret to me, nor did I make a secret of them to any body; but I do know, that a man might calculate on as much success in going a tilting—not at shadows, as the gentleman from S. Carolina says—not like the Knight of La Mancha at sheep and windmills—but rather at a flock of mad cattle, pent up in a narrow lane, as to attempt to ferret out the abuses, without having the cordial co-operation of those who are at the head of the Departments, and that co-operation it would be worse than folly to pretend to look for. On that subject, Sir, I declare the pleasure that it gives me to bear my testimony, such as it is, along with the gentleman from South Carolina, to the public services, the intelligence, the integrity, and the indefatigability of the officer who is at the head of the Post Office Department. I voted against increasing his salary. It is the only one of the Departments which I have lately had any thing to do with, and whenever I had occasion to go there, I have always found him in his office, and at his business. Sir, there was a time when I often had to visit the Departments, (which does not, however, affect the present Administration,) and then I seldom had the honor to find any of their high lightnesses at home—I mean, in their offices. Sir, we cannot expect the cordial co-operation of the Heads of Departments in such an inquiry as is now proposed. They are sitting before the bar of public opinion for their lives, with a zeal proportioned to the strong evidence before the jury of their guilt.

Retrenchment.

I shall vote, however, for the amendment moved by the gentleman from South Carolina, and, if it prevails, I shall vote against the resolution as so amended. And let me, before I sit down, give one warning to all concerned. This country, as we all know, is divided into two adversary parties; and we must shut our eyes to the fact, if we do not know that this House is nearly, or quite, equally divided between them. Fas est ab hoste loqui. I see one of these parties, perfectly willing, no doubt, with the very great man to whom I have before alluded, to throw upon us the responsibility for whatever is done here, sitting perfectly still, steadfast, silent, and demure, bringing forward no proposition whatever. I see the other party throwing out proposition after proposition. The opposite party never commits itself until after a night's reflection. And what is the consequence? Through, I believe, a minority, they so manage matters, as on every question to constitute an effective majority of this House, and then throw on us the responsibility of their own measures. Sir, this is a new sort of political justice.

Again, I see most plainly, with the gentleman from South Carolina, that this inquiry will end in smoke—and I am not one who will light the fire, or help to raise a smoke by which a retreating adversary may cover and protect his retreat. I will afford them no facilities towards victory. I stand here pledged as their adversary, quoad hoc, and I will add another pledge to oppose any and every party who would impose on this country any man, as its Chief Magistrate, besides him who receives the greatest number of its votes. Sir, if we must amend the Constitution, I shall not vote for a hereditary Chief Magistrate—I do not belong to that privileged class—the President of a minority is hardly less odious than a King—but I warn the House against any attempt at reform while the President is not with us. In the Seventh Congress, in spite of all Mr. Jefferson did, his measures were thwarted; and when was an Administration stronger? Then, with a House of Representatives so equally balanced as this, (and I take the vote for the election of Speaker as the indication of its state,) with the scale vibrating, nearly in equilibrium, it is almost impossible to be certain of a majority, let our measures be ever so well concerted. How could we get along, even if the Executive was on our side, acting against a solid phalanx who hold together—so perfectly united that we cannot cut off a single straggler, while we ourselves act more like raw undisciplined militia? Sir, I speak from experience. In the Seventh Congress, Sir, we never could have got along, with the aid of the most popular President that ever lived (except one) without consulting before we acted. We were obliged to hold—I will not use a barbarous word which has become common throughout the country, and which I first heard in this body—but we were obliged to act in concert. And, Sir, if we do not act in concert now, it is not we who will be responsible for the consequences. And how ought we to act in concert? Sir, by leaving this Government just in the course where we found it. We ought to observe that practice which is the hardest of all—especially for young physicians—we ought to throw in no medicine at all—to abstain—to observe a wise and masterly inactivity. I am afraid, Sir, (said Mr. R., on resuming his seat,) that I have not on this occasion, added to my precept my example.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1828.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions heretofore moved by Mr. CHILTON, together with the modifications proposed by Messrs. TAYLOR and McDUFFIE.

And the question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. McDUFFIE to the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR—

Mr. CARSON said, that the object for which he had originally attempted to obtain the floor was, to state the reasons which had induced him to vote for laying the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON] together with the amendment of the gentlemen from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] on the table. As he had not had an opportunity of proceeding after he had obtained the floor, he considered it due to himself now to state those reasons.

Mr. CHILTON here requested Mr. CARSON to yield him the floor for a moment, and Mr. CARSON having done so,

Mr. CHILTON asked if it would be in order for him now to modify his resolutions as no amendment to them had yet been adopted?

The SPEAKER replied that it would be perfectly in order: Whereupon,

Mr. CHILTON modified his resolutions, so as to read as follows:

"1. Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, measures ought to be adopted to diminish Executive patronage; to secure a more effectual responsibility in the disbursement of the public money; and, also, what retrenchment can be made in the public expenditures without injury to the public service; and, also, whether any, and, if any, what, measures may be adopted for the more effectual application of the Sinking Fund to the payment of the Public debt.

"2. Resolved, That the said committee be directed to inquire and report to the House the amount of monies which have been paid since the 1st of January, 1824, and of the several appropriations made for contingencies of Foreign Intercourse, and which have been settled at the Treasury, without specification; and, also the payment made out of the same appropriations, and the appropriations for the contingent expenses of missions abroad, which have been settled at the Treasury in the usual manner, according to law.

"3. Resolved, That the Committee on the Expenditures of the State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, be instructed to inquire and report what sums have been paid, out of the several appropriations made since the 1st of January, 1824, for the contingent expenses of the said Departments, to whom paid, and for what service.

"4. Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be directed to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what retrenchments can be made in the expenses of this House."

Of course, the amendments to the original resolutions now fell, as their form had been changed, and they were open for any further amendment which might be proposed.

Mr. CARSON then resumed. In that part of the rules of the House prescribing the duties of the several committees, (said Mr. C.) the attention of the Committee on Public Expenditures is particularly directed to this subject, and it is made their duty to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether such moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws.

We find this duty in the 65th rule of this House, as follows :

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws ; and, also, to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers."

Now, I did believe that the duties of that committee being of this nature, precluded the necessity of the resolution which was offered, and I further thought that this was a very improper time for its introduction—that it could be attended with no beneficial result to the community, and that its only effect would be to waste the time of this body and produce electioneering speeches on this floor. I was not mistaken, as has since been shewn by the progress of the present debate. It appears that even gentlemen who have expressed a disposition to transact the public business and return home, have nevertheless been actuated, by an anxiety of a political kind, to turn this matter to the benefit of one or the other of the great parties which now divide this country.

He had explained himself on this subject, to a gentleman from Ohio, in the folding room attached to this House a few days ago, where he was justified in saying, that he saw thousands of the celebrated Virginia Address written by Chapman Johnson, folding to be sent to the North and to the West, and even to the South ; and the hope, I understand, is entertained, that the old State of North Carolina, among others, is to be revolutionized by the effect of this address of Chapman Johnson. But, sir, I can tell those gentlemen, who expect this to be the result in North Carolina, that they will find themselves completely defeated in all their efforts to produce such a result. Sir, North Carolina has repeatedly been tried, and in every instance she has been true to herself, and done her duty. I mentioned to that gentleman that all such attempts were perfectly useless, and the reply I received was, "though the chances are now for you, yet a reaction will speedily be brought about," and this subject is seized upon as one means to aid in producing that result. Sir, I do not care for this. No event in future is more certain, according to my judgment, than the election of General Jackson ; but, let that be as it may, I wish to see no discussions on this floor, except such as are calculated to advance the good of the community, and that we may do the public business and go home, instead of remaining here, as the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. RANDOLPH] has said, to feed upon the Public Treasury.

But, as the discussion is to be proceeded in, I wish to offer a few remarks in reply to some of the expressions which dropped from the gentlemen who have preceded me. And I ask leave, in the first place, to notice some of the remarks of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [MR. STUART.] He said that he would vote for the resolution because it was a measure of retrenchment and economy—but what were his subsequent expressions ?—why sir, he told us that the sinking fund was too great, and that we were paying off the public debt too fast, and he added that we ought not to do this, because the continuance of the public debt promoted economy. Yes, sir, to remain in debt, and to pay large sums for interest, promotes economy. If I recollect right, when a few days since a discussion took place on a resolution of an honorable gentleman from Virginia, [MR. P. P. BARBOUR] for selling out the stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States, the same gentleman from Pennsylvania urged another and a different reason why the public debt should not be paid off. He then told us that our sources of revenue ought to be curtailed, and new channels of expenditure opened for the national capital to flow in, lest the public treasury should become so full that it would die of plethora. Now, his opinion seems entirely changed—the apprehensions he then felt, have, since that time, it seems, completely evaporated, and he now tells us the public debt must not be paid, because its continuance promotes economy. I think that the nature of the concerns of a nation may be greatly simplified by comparing them with those of a judicious private family. The mode which ought to be pursued by the head of such a family, to better his affairs, I should suppose would be to reduce his expenses within his income and not to economise by suffering his debts to remain, and the accruing interest to prey upon him like a moth.

I will next say a word as to the remarks which fell from the gentleman from Indiana [MR. BLAKE.] Towards that gentleman I cherish the best feeling—I esteem him highly, and am only sorry that we are not more closely united in our political opinions. The true question before the House, (says that gentleman) is neither more nor less than this : Is the present a prodigal Administration ? I was aware, when the resolution was first introduced, that the friends of the Administration would seek to make it appear that this measure had originated with and was pressed by the friends of Gen. Jackson, as furnishing an opportunity of preferring charges against the Administration. It was necessary for them to assume this as the true question, that they might with the better grace introduce encomiums and eulogies upon those who conduct the Government. That gentleman has also complained of the misrepresentations that have gone abroad against the Administration—and hopes there is liberality enough in this House to do them justice, and acquit them of the calumnies which have been heaped upon them, &c.

I, too, Mr. Speaker, regret that any misrepresentations should have been made on either side ; but, upon my soul, I think they have no right to complain on that point. If they will but turn their eyes to what has been said by the Government papers on the character of General Jackson, it must be acknowledged that they have beaten us far in misrepresentation and calumny ; and, Sir, I do not envy them their distinction : for I shall never dispute the palm with them on that subject. Sir, what has been said, or rather, what has not been said against Gen. Jackson ? Need I refer to all the Administration press in the United States ? Need I refer to a recent book published by the Secretary of State, accompanied with letters or certificates, I think he calls them, intended to exculpate him from the charge of corruption ? Sir, have they stopped here ? Has the character of Gen. Jackson alone been assailed ? No, Sir. Like the Hyena, that fellest of the fell, which robs the graves of the dead, they have entered the sanctuary of domestic retirement, and dragged before the bar of the public, loaded with the basest slanders, the character of an innocent and much injured lady. Have they done this, and do they now complain, and charge us with wishing to heap calumny on the Administration ? Sir, I propose nothing like it. I would treat the Administration justly ; and all I ask is, that they shall do the same justice to General Jackson, and his friends.

The gentleman [MR. BLAKE] also asks us, what new offices have been created under this Administration ? And he answers the question himself, by saying, not one. The question and the reply are intended to go before the community, and to produce their effect abroad. Sir, let the gentleman accept an answer from me. I answer him the officers attached to the far-famed Panama Mission, have been created by the President. I shall not say any thing on the subject of that mission. The nature of it is well understood by the American People. But I must be permitted to remark on the assumption of power by the Executive in this case. In his first message he stated to us that the invitation had been received, inviting this Nation to be represented at the Congress of Nations, shortly to be convened at the Isthmus of Panama, and, he adds, "the invitation has been accepted, and Ministers will be commissioned and sent." He subsequently submitted, it is true, the appointment of these Ministers to the Senate, and if he had not written, at the same time, a communication to that body, I should have supposed, that when he said "Ministers will be commissioned and sent," he meant, as of course, to be understood that they would be commissioned and sent by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. But in that communication he tells the Senate that he had concluded it to be within his constitutional competency to send these Ministers by his own authority, but that he had graciously condescended, as a matter of courtesy, I suppose, to ask for their consent. Now, sir, I am a plain dealing man, but as the President is a magistrate high in office, I ought not, perhaps to, say, that he is either ignorant or corrupt. But this I may be permitted to say, and this I will say, that if any other man had said as much, I should be able to convict him, either of the grossest ignorance, or of the grossest—what is worse. What says the Constitution? Here Mr. C. quoted as follows.

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur: and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other Public Ministers, and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of law, or in the Heads of Departments. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Now, Sir, if he can only do this, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, it certainly follows that he has no authority to do it without their advice and consent, and if he believed the contrary, it is charity to attribute such a belief to ignorance. Such at least is my opinion, but it may be owing to my plainness and want of capacity to dive into such matters as well as he. He may derive it from some superhuman power, such as produced his "superadded obligation" to send an armed force against Georgia; with such powers I am unacquainted, but if there be such superadded power it must be accompanied with a superadded responsibility.

Let me now say a word to the gentleman from Ohio, who spoke last yesterday, [Mr. WATSON.] I heard, that gentleman demanding, as I thought, proudly, what are the abuses of which we complain and boldly challenging the fullest investigation. Sir, I think I could, with great propriety, refer him for an answer to a certain committee, called, if I mistake not, the secret committee—(I speak of this from newspaper authority)—and which was organized here last Winter. It may be that that committee, were they so disposed, could point out a great many of the corruptions and abuses of this Government; but, as they were a secret committee, I doubt greatly whether they would be much inclined to develop mysteries of that character. I rather think they would be more disposed to secrete them. I will however, ask leave of the gentleman to point out one or two. It was an abuse of the contingent fund of the State Department to pay young Mr. King an outfit of $4,500 as Charge d'Affaires while he remained in England. It was an abuse of that fund to pay John H. Pleasants nineteen hundred dollars for carrying out despatches to Buenos Ayres, when he got so far out of his latitude as to land at Liverpool. Sir, I will mention another abuse. When a Minister was appointed to the Panama Mission, a certain gentleman was appointed as Secretary of Legation to that Mission, and paid his salary, while at the same time, that gentleman was on an electioneering tour in the State of New York, as a candidate for Governor of that State. This fact we have in an answer of the Secretary of State to an inquiry of this House on that subject. The Secretary acknowledges that he received his salary for going abroad, while he staid at home; but assigns, as a reason, that the gentleman resigned a lucrative office to accept of this appointment. But an examination and comparison of dates will show that he had resigned that office sometime before, and for the avowed reason that he could not discharge the duties of it, on account of ill health. Now, if the Government may pay a man for doing the public business abroad, while, at the same time, they permit him to remain at home electioneering for a Governor's Chair, or for any other purpose, I say it is an abuse, and ought to be remedied.

Speaking of the establishment at West Point, permit me to make one remark. Among the items in the estimates for that institution, I find the following: "For compensation to twenty supernumerary Second Lieutenants, $15,100." Here are twenty young men who have been educated at the public expense and who are now supported at their own homes, at an annual expense of $15,000. Sir, is this economy? I know that that institution was got up under a different administration; but this application of the public money has been made by the present administration, and it is one of those expenditures which ought to be considered in the present inquiry.

The gentleman from Ohio said further, that he would to God that the House could force a tariff upon the country, or that a tariff could be forced upon us, (I will not be sure of the exact words,) and if he thought this, he should return home better satisfied. I shall only say at present, that he and his friends had better not attempt to force that measure upon the South. We, sir, are a kind of People, who will not be forced; and let the gentleman remember, too, that, while the friends of that measure are forcing the tariff upon us, they are precisely, at the same rate, forcing an inroad upon the Constitution; for, sir, the very objects of the meeting of that Convention which framed the Constitution, and the causes which influenced the leading statesmen and patriots of that day, to unite in the establishment of a Federal Government, and the very reasons which were urged (and which, in fact, produced the effect) upon the States, to give up a part of their rights as sovereignties for the good of the whole, forbids the idea, that it could have been intended (immaterial how worded) that those powers should have been extended to the injury of a part, or even one of them, for the benefit of others: for, sir, in the concession of those rights by the States, the advantages and the injuries resulting from them, were to be mutually shared by all—a perfect reciprocity of interests was to be observed, and preserved; and any measure passed by Congress, which, while it benefits one part of the Union, as manifestly injures the other, is a violation of the spirit and intent of that instrument; but more especially is it a violation, when such measures are "forced upon States not willing to be forced."

Much, sir, has been said on the per diem allowance of the members of Congress. I know, perfectly well, that no man more honestly expressed his opinion on that subject, than my colleague, [Mr. CULPHER] who spoke yesterday. That gentleman has given us the reasons which induced him to receive his pay—other gentlemen may have other reasons. I do not think with the gentlemen who have said that the rate of compensation is too low—my constituents understood the pay I was to receive when they sent me here, and I am willing to receive it—but if the members of the House are disposed to curtail the rate of pay, I am ready to go with them. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BARNEY], in stating his reasons for thinking the present rate ought to be continued, was pleased to favor us with an account of the manner in which he spends his pay as a member. He said that he could hold up, in this House, a spotless hand of purity, that he kept none of the public money, &c., and one of the reasons is, that he spends so much in deeds of charity, "to cover," as he tells us, "a multitude of sins." Sir, the gentleman has let the House into a secret. I did not know that the gentleman had any sins to cover, except his political sins—and I did hope, that his experience here would lead him to repentance, and that he would, ere long, turn from the error of his ways, embrace the true faith, and come over to the cause of the People, and support General Jackson.

Retrenchment.

Mr. KREMER said, when this resolution was first offered, I little thought it would have opened such a theme of discussion. It appeared to me so plain a case that I thought it would have gone to a committee without any opposition, and that that committee would have gone on with diligence to ascertain what retrenchment could be effected. I have been disappointed. It has encountered an opposition I little expected, and however unwilling I always am, to address this House, I feel that my duty calls me, and I shall do it. I could agree to waive farther discussion, so far as I am myself concerned, but for the extraordinary course pursued by gentlemen who oppose the resolution. The gentleman from Ohio in particular, [Mr. WATERS] inquires, who is there that knows of any abuses? I will answer the gentleman by another question. Who is there that does not know them? Talk to me of the purity existing here! But we have heard an extract read from our beloved President's message, recommending to us the observance of economy. I ask, in what is it to be found? In sending a superannuated Minister abroad, to do nothing but pocket the money, and leave the public business undone? Is it in the famous mission to Panama, in search of a Congress, that nobody has been able to find? Was this any evidence of economy? The American People will say, we want no such evidences of your economy—we want you to redeem the extravagance of this Government, and bring back to us the old fashioned economy—not the new fashioned. When the elder or first Adams attempted to break the Constitution, and introduce a system of wasteful extravagance, the People measured out to him what justice required; I hope the same justice that was measured to the first, will be measured out to the second. To doubt it, would be to doubt the knowledge, virtue, and intelligence, of the People. And has it come to this? Are we to be told there is no corruption here? Sir, it is little villainy that begets great crimes. It is the bright sun that brings forth the adder. The same law that forbids you to touch, forbids the wish to touch. What have we not seen? Has not a branch of the illustrious men who achieved our revolution had the bread taken out of her mouth, and out of the mouth of her orphan children, to give it to John Binns? And who is John Binns? The Editor of a Journal, notorious for his opposition to Mr. Adams, when he was a candidate for the Presidency, and as notorious for his sudden conversion. Sir, his conversion produced great astonishment, but the mystery was soon explained—the dog had got his sop—some $1,500 or $2,000 per annum. A tolerable sop—yet this had no influence at all on the gentleman's patriotic mind. The printing and stationery was taken from a poor widow, and distributed among the creatures of patronage. I, for one, will vote for the resolution in every shape and form; I see from the discussion that many gentlemen are opposed to it, and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] said, truly, that it is in vain to attempt now to go to the bottom and ferret out all the abuses that exist. I am well aware of this. I know that the monstrous extravagance of the contingent fund, and such a vast amount of secret service money don't comport with the character of a Republic. What! Sir: Secrets in a Republic! Secrets, sir, and in times of peace! No, sir, a Republic should be as open as day. The People, sir, will frown on these deeds of darkness, and the result of the election of 1828, will proclaim to an astonished world that they are not to be bought and sold. One word more, sir. Let me earnestly urge it on all the friends of reform, that, although the measure is ill-timed, and although we can't reach the bottom of this stinking pool, let us go as far into it as we can. If we fail, though we may not obtain success, we shall have done more—we shall have deserved it. It is not in a day or in an hour, that such a monster is to be levelled. I again invoke the friends of reform, as they hold in veneration the blood of their ancestors, and the memory of their departed worth, not to withdraw their support from this inquiry. Sir, it is in vain that Washington, and Green, and Sumpter, and Gates, and Marion, and Lafayette, hazarded their blood in contending for our liberty. Aye, sir, and that Jackson fought in two wars; and that the great Jefferson labored for us in the Cabinet, if we are now to give up the ship. I hope we shant do it. I hope, like the gentleman from Indiana, we shall nail our flag to the mast, and in such a ship, sir, manned by the American People, and commanded by such an officer, we shall put down all those who dare oppose us.

Mr. BARNEY remarked, that his friend and neighbor, from North Carolina, had presented him with a draft, at sight, which, though not strictly payable to order, as it relates to his political creed, certainly not now under consideration, yet should be promptly honored. Could he consent to descend from his station as a Representative of the People, degenerate into a mere political partisan, put on the badge and livery of party, and become that thing which no freeman could be, and still be free, another man's man—he should with brisk step come to the right about, and in "ore" rotundo, with all the ingenuity he could command, attempt to justify himself to the House for sustaining by his vote those very resolutions which he had opposed in debate; but returning was more tedious than to go on. In a spirit of manly frankness, above all praise, the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had declared that this investigation could not result in convicting the Administration of extravagance or prodigality; and the honorable member from Virginia, whom I do not now see in his seat—

[Here Mr. ALEXANDER rose and said, that he was requested to announce that his colleague [Mr. RANDOLPH] would be necessarily absent during the day.]

Mr. BARNEY continued, that he had not designed to say any thing that would call for remark or reply from that honorable member. His declarations, made yesterday on the floor, fresh in the recollection of all who heard them, were, in substance, that this investigation, if gone into, would rather strengthen than prejudice the Administration. Believing that the utmost purity prevails in our institutions; that they are not only pure, but above suspicion, I have and shall continue to oppose this species of legislation.

While we confine ourselves, Mr. Speaker, to the legitimate duties devolved on us, we continue to be the re-representatives of 40,000 freemen; but that moment we descend to become electioneering partisans, we resolve ourselves into units, one in the great mass of our countrymen, possessed of equal rights, and equally competent with ourselves to judge and decide on the important question, who shall become our next Chief Magistrate. I have resolved to steer clear of all party strife, but seek not to conceal my sentiments. I believe the present to be an honest Administration, ably administered. In Mr. Adams I behold a plain unpretending republican, who has enjoyed, in an eminent degree, the confidence of all his illustrious predecessors; incessantly devoting the energies of his vigorous intellect to the advancement of the best interests of his country; while the distinguished services of Gen. Jackson have encircled his brow with a wreath of never-fading glory, and embalmed him in the affections of a large portion of his countrymen. It remains with the only sovereigns, the People, to decide between their respective claims. It is not for me, nor for us, to interfere. We, too, are public servants, and have other important duties assigned to us. My maxim ever has been, and shall be—may the Administration of my country be always right, and while right may it be supported.

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that so much of the resolution as relate to our compensation is omitted in the modifications of them. [I am told it is not, and I am sorry for it.] It is immaterial how long the discussion may be protracted, it will all end in smoke. We may continue six weeks longer in a vapor bath, but the per diem will remain undiminished.

In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky—I do not allude to the mover of those propositions, for the conciliatory tone of that gentleman's concluding remarks leaves nothing existing between us except good will, but to the second gentleman from Kentucky—who responded to me, and rode my old horse rather roughly: this was perfectly fair, and had he not alluded to my constituents, I should not complain. They, sir, are so far removed above his censure, that they cannot be elevated by any encomiums of mine. I cannot retort upon his constituents any unkind allusion; an intimate association with them forms one of the most pleasing recollections of my early life, and my district of country feel so strongly the identity of interest which binds the Atlantic border to the Western world, that they are now vigorously employed in facilitating the means of intercourse which are more firmly to unite them as one common family. I will not retaliate, lest I should cause the crimson blush of shame to mantle in the cheeks of those I represent, should I, by any similar coarseness of language, expose myself to your rebuke when interposing the authority of the Chair to sustain the dignity of the House over which you preside, Sir, in a manner calculated not only to command the respect, but to win the esteem of all its members. And although the gentleman has drawn the sword, I do not throw away the scabbard. I will not be forced, in an angry discussion, to retort harshness of invective inconsistent with self-respect.

The gentleman from Tennessee has stated that there are twenty supernumeraries, graduates at West Point now at their homes, unemployed. It is true, Sir. Those young men, in four years devoted to study, are permitted but once to visit their families. After obtaining their degrees they generally receive a furlough of two or three months, which enables them to renew that intercourse, and rekindle that glow of affection to their parents and friends, which too long a separation might entirely alienate. Will any father say that this is extravagant indulgence? It is, however, probable, that at this present moment, there are not vacancies in the army to offer them immediate employment, but in a very short time they become merged in the Register, and cease to be supernumeraries. Having seen and known at West Point the destitute orphan son of a widowed mother, who was there educated, and is now one of the most distinguished Professors, I mention the fact, to convince my friend from Tennessee that its benefits are not monopolized by the children of the affluent and influential.

The gentleman from Virginia expressed great repugnance at the idea of a son of his receiving an education at West Point. He would rather he should make his mark, and not be able to read or write. Sir, were this a Charity School, so would every man who had the means to educate his children out of his own purse. Do not those young men repay the debt of gratitude due to the nation? A well organized army, well constructed fortifications, are necessary to its defence. The elements of military science imparted to them become the property of their country, and are called into active requisition, in the construction of its fortresses and resistance to its enemies; and even should they return to the paths of civil life, in imparting their science to the militia, our nation's best bulwark, they thus contribute more essentially to its advantage than while in the tented field. I have never ranked, Mr. Speaker, among the radicals. I hope I shall not be deemed a prodigal, when desiring to be found among those liberal politicians disposed to cherish the existing institutions of our country, and by ample appropriations, commensurate with her resources, advance internal improvements, cherish your Army, your Navy, increase your national defences of every description; and thus accelerate the speed of the Republic in her march to the high destinies which await her, and which can only be arrested by a system of injudicious and wasteful parsimony.

Mr. DANIEL said, that he again felt himself called upon by the allusion of the gentleman from Maryland, to make a few remarks in explanation. I certainly had no intention to wound the feelings of him, or of his constituents. I had supposed, from the many encomiums he passed upon his horse, and the accounts he gave us of the intelligence of that animal, that I had rather paid a compliment to his constituents, and to the gentleman himself, than otherwise, seeing that the animal could be sent upon his rounds without his rider, on an electioneering expedition, to teach to the gentleman's constituents the politics of the day. [Mr. BARNES here shook his head.] The gentleman says I am mistaken. It is possible I was, but I so understood him, and in consequence of this, it was, that I supposed the gentleman's horse more intelligent than his constituents. I reciprocate the warm feelings of the gentleman, for the State I have the honor to represent, and I shall be willing at all times to unite with him in every endeavor towards connecting the Western States of this Union with the State of Maryland. For, I believe that it is by commercial intercourse that the opinions of men are more or less formed, and when that connexion shall take place, I have a great hope of the conversion of that gentleman to the true principles of Republicanism, (which I dare say he considers himself as holding at this time.) The opposers of the resolution tell us that nothing can be done, and one gentleman has said, that all reference to the per diem allowance is left out of it, as now modified. I have not so understood it—I thought that it was made the duty of the committee to make inquiry into all species of retrenchment which can be effected, without injury to the public interest. All resolutions of this description, whenever they are introduced, produce much good. They awaken all concerned to diligence and inquiry; abuses are searched out, and the cause of economy promoted. Yet, it has appeared strange to me, that gentlemen on this floor, while urging every argument they can think of against the resolution, tell us, at the same time, that they are strongly in favor of it. They declare that they are very much in favor of searching out abuses, though there are no abuses in the Government to search out, and though they are certain it will end in nothing, yet that they support it, and will vote for it. This course of argument appears to me strange. That abuses do exist, I have not the least doubt; if they do not, why do gentlemen oppose inquiry? Can any injury result from it? If the Administration be indeed as pure as some gentlemen seem to imagine, it ought to be their boast and pride that the search should be made, let it result as it will. They call upon us to point out the abuses. Many have already been pointed out. But, is this the time to call out for a detail of the abuses, when we are just appointing a committee to inquire if any abuses exist? They make a question, and answer it themselves. They tell us all is well. Every thing is as it should be. Well, Sir, if so, let the inquiry go on. Let us see if the Administration is as pure as they would have us believe. I acknowledge that I am incompetent to point out the various abuses that may exist in a Government so complicated as ours. It is only from newspaper rumor that I derive my knowledge of it. And, if I am to believe what I see there, then I can have no doubt that there ought to be an inquiry. I could name some offices which have been created under this Administration. The Panama Mission has cost us somewhere about 80 or $100,000. Has it resulted in any great benefit? A Minister was sent to England, who was perfectly superannuated, and wholly unable to perform any duty, and it was through this that we lost the West India trade, and this, in my opinion, was a great loss. There was another great abuse of power. This man was known, at the time, to be incompetent, and his mission cost us 30 or $40,000. We have had another Minister sent out since, who has returned without much benefit. There have been other abuses. Men have been paid for taking out despatches to our Ministers who went out in the very ship with the Ministers themselves. I should certainly have thought, that the Ministers might have so far condescended, as to take charge of these documents themselves. Another instance of abuse is to be found in the outfits of our Foreign Ministers. $9,000 per annum as salary, I should think was an ample provision, without $9,000 outfit, especially when we furnish a vessel, and bear all the expenses of their transportation to the spot. This in my opinion, is an item which calls for retrenchment, and; under the resolution, it can be reached. But, we not only give our Ministers outfits when they go out, but we must give them homefits when they come home. Was not this the case with young Mr. King? He had an outfit of $4,500, and yet his homefit was paid him within sixty days. Is there any example of this under other Administrations? Sir, it is enormous. It may appear a little sum, but it is very much if rightly considered. The expenditure of the public money in the Government at home, has been made the subject of equal abuses. In the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, the disbursement of $300,000, is attended with an expense of 50 or $60,000. Is there any one who cannot see that this is an abuse? And who is responsible for these things? Who commands the vessel? Who steers it? Sir, the President of the United States is responsible. Gentlemen need not imagine that we are responsible, because we happen to have a majority in this House, and in the Senate. The President is responsible for the whole. I care not whether these offices were in existence before the present Administration came into power, or not. The President ought to examine into them, and if any of them can be dispensed with, he ought to have pointed them out particularly in his message to Congress. He has the entire control over these officers, and may dismiss, any, or all of them, at his will or pleasure. He had it in his power to work a great reform. Did he point out any particular abuse? Did he designate any one office that could be dispensed with? No Sir. On that subject he was as silent as the grave. Still, we are told that the President has recommended to us economy. Yes Sir, but not in a way which renders it tangible. The recommendation is for the mere purpose of show—that it may go abroad among the People, and benefit him and his cause. Sir, I am clear of one thing. If this resolution shall be adopted, whether Congress do, or not, the People will work a reform. The nation will compel her Representatives to do it. I, for one, will support this cause so long as I have a seat on this floor. I believe that many of the offices under this Government, are mere sinecures, of no manner of good to the public, and that they ought to be abolished.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that he rose for the purpose of removing an impression which the gentleman from Maryland seemed to have received from the remarks he made when last up, and he did so, not because he thought that his views wanted any farther explanation, but to prevent them from being misunderstood and misrepresented. The gentleman assumes what he is not entitled to assume. He infers, from what, I said, that I meant to declare that no investigation could result in any thing disparaging to the present Administration. Sir, I said no such thing, nor had my observation any such bearing. On the contrary, I have expressly avoided either to inculpate or to exculpate the Administration. It was then my purpose, and it is now to avoid saying any thing which may have a bearing on the Administration, in one way or the other, except what refers to the subject immediately before us. I did say, that the inquiry proposed to be referred to a Committee of this House, would result in nothing this Session. Whether there are abuses or not—whether our Ministers abroad have been sent out too often, and changed without sufficient reason, are questions not involved in the resolution. The question before us is not, what the Government has done—that is past and over—but this is a practical resolution, which has reference wholly to future reforms. Whether the Panama Mission was wise and expedient, or not, is not now before us—that Mission is at an end—it is a matter of history—why, then, bring it up here, and at this time? What I said yesterday, referred to the practical proposition before the House. As such I said, and I still say, that it will end in nothing. As bearing on the Administration, it has no business here. In that character I disclaim it entirely. So much by way of explanation. I will now submit a proposition of amendment. I move to amend the resolution, as modified, by striking out the following:

“And also, whether any, and if any, what measures may be adopted for the more effectual application of the Sinking Fund to the payment of the Public Debt.”

When the original resolution was first introduced into the House. I resisted it. I am equally opposed to any thing else being referred to the committee of Ways and Means, which does not exclusively belong to their duty. If there is any thing which reflects on that Committee, as not having performed its duty, it is the not attending to a rapid discharge of the public debt. So much, therefore, of this resolution, as refers to the public debt, and to the mode of its discharge, will, I hope, be stricken out of it. That subject is before the Committee of Ways and Means. The existing laws give full efficacy to all the means which the country possesses of discharging that debt. No resolution will either hasten or retard its payment. Whatever the surplus in the Treasury may be, it goes, by law, to that object.

Mr. BARNEY said the gentleman certainly did admit that no salaries had been increased under this Administration except that of the Postmaster General, and no additional offices created, save a few Clerks in the Departments. Consequently, that they (the Administration) could not be held responsible for any alleged extravagance, or unnecessary increase of offices.

Mr. CHILTON now signified his acceptance of Mr. McDuffie's amendment, as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, said, that, on the introduction of the original resolution, it had not been his intention to trouble the House with any remarks in relation to it, and his disinclination to do so had been much increased by the very frank, candid, and honorable manner in which the subject had since been treated by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I return my thanks, said Mr. C. to that gentleman for the manner in which he has expressed himself. He has said nothing, with the exception of a single paragraph, that does not meet my entire approbation, and I should not now have offered to the House a single remark, but for the language which has fallen from gentlemen friendly to the resolution—language in which they have strongly denounced the present Administration, before any investigation has taken place. It is the office of reason, as it is that of justice, humanity, and Christian charity, always to hear the testimony before judgment is pronounced. I ask gentlemen whether there is any thing like testimony to justify the severe remarks they have made on what they have affirmed to be the profligate expenditures of this Government. I know very well that there is a great deal on this subject in the newspapers, and that, during the last canvass for President, it was in some parts of the country, (and in saying this I do not refer to any individual on the floor) made an instrument by which the public mind was greatly excited. I am now glad to see a prospect of that excitement being allayed by means of the resolution introduced, by my friend from Kentucky. I preferred the original form of the resolution, however, since I think that the Committee of Ways and Means is the proper organ through whom this inquiry should be made. It will be recollected, that, at the last session, the Secretary of the Treasury earnestly recommended the exchange of the sixteen millions of the present six per cent. stock of the United States for other stock, of a later date of payment, at five per cent. by which operation, had it been adopted, there would have been effected a clear annual saving of 160,000 dollars, and I consider it well worthy of consideration by the Committee of Ways and Means, whether such an exchange cannot still be effected. I preferred the first resolution, because it referred the inquiry to a Committee which may justly be entitled the first in this House, and of which I am free to say, that, in its wisdom, application, and integrity, I entirely confide. I think the subject ought to be referred to that committee and to no other. It is one of the peculiar subjects over which that committee is called to preside, by the Rules and Orders of this House; and although I should be loth to burthen the committee with unnecessary labor, yet I consider it of vital importance to call forth in this inquiry, the first talents of the country. It is an investigation, which, from its own nature, cannot properly be executed unless by an individual intimately acquainted with all the operations of the Departments of this Government. The Committee of Ways and Means, in the regular discharge of their duty, have been compelled to acquaint themselves with the routine of business in the Departments. They have the knowledge and are familiar with it, and they could prosecute the inquiry with one-third of the labor that would be required by any other committee of the House; and when they should present a report, it would have far more of the confidence of this House, than if proceeding from any other quarter.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] supposed that, though the friends of the Administration in this House, have openly avowed themselves to be in favor of the resolution, yet that they have a secret hostility to it, and that that hostility has been developed in various shapes during the present discussion. If such be the fact in respect to any other friends of the Administration, I, for one, utterly disclaim it. The gentleman who first proposed the inquiry cannot be more anxious for it than I am. I recollect no remark made by any friend of the Administration manifesting any thing like unwillingness that this investigation should proceed. If a single remark of this kind has been made, it has escaped my observation. Gentlemen have indeed rebutted some of the round charges made, without proof, against the officers of the Government, but they have at the same time challenged, instead of deprecating inquiry. I have no doubt that the gentlemen who have made these charges about extravagance, do themselves believe what they have here asserted; but the assertion has certainly been made without a particle of proof, so far as this House is concerned. I do believe them to be entirely sincere, and it is for that very reason that I am desirous the investigation should take place. If there are abuses, let them be exposed. It is our solemn duty to expose every defaulter and every individual who improperly applies the money in the Treasury. I would disclaim the cause of any Administration who applied the revenues of their country to their own private interest, or personal aggrandizement. I don't believe the charge; we have no proofs before us; and years of faithful public service, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, forbid me to believe it. In the keen acrimony of party strife, had any such facts existed, proof would, ere this, have been exhibited in abundance. No proof has been adduced—the charges consist in round assertions. But, I have never yet seen, on the records of this House, any thing that could warrant a belief that those assertions are true. Sir, I have regretted to witness the character of this debate. Surely this is a question which does not characterize party in this House. Surely we have not yet arrived at that degree of mutual ill-will, and that disregard of all public justice, which, when abuses are to be investigated, arrays the members of this House in compact and opposite ranks, for and against any Administration, or for and against any Presidential candidate. Such a state of things were beneath the dignity of this House. Surely it becomes us all to do strict justice to him who administers the concerns of the country, be that individual whom he may. If, on the one hand, it is important to the welfare of this People that their Representatives shall drag forth into public view that man who violates their trust, and expose him to the infamy which he deserves, it is equally important, on the other, that they should measure out to him who has discharged that trust with laborious fidelity, a just reward.

I felt a good deal of regret while I listened to some of the remarks of an honorable member from Tennessee. [Mr. MITCHELL.] I know the good sense, the upright intentions, and the characteristic openness and candor, which belong to that gentleman; and I did think that his candor and good sense might have suggested to him, that, if there be any mismanagement in the Military Academy at West Point, it is not chargeable upon this Administration, because that institution is not a child of theirs, and because the recommendation of the candidates for admission, is a matter in which they have no sort of concern.

[Mr. MITCHELL now requested the gentleman from Kentucky to yield him the floor for a moment, that he might explain, and Mr. CLARK having done so,

Mr. MITCHELL said, that he could assure the gentleman, with the greatest sincerity, that, when he made those remarks to which the gentleman alluded, so far from intending to bring any charge against the Administration, the Administration was not even in his recollection. He was perfectly aware that the present Administration did not create the Academy at West Point, and they had nothing to do with the question as to the policy or impolicy of such an institution. He never should advance any thing against the present Administration, or any other, without evidence to support it. It did not belong to his character to accuse any one wrongfully, or to cherish personal ill-will against any man or set of men. He made this explanation to the gentleman from Kentucky with great pleasure, because he really believed him to be a clever man. For himself, he did not care with whom abuses had originated; if the Government and the country were ruined, it would make no difference in the result to determine by what Administration it had been effected. He was not desirous of convicting any one, but only sought to remedy abuse, if it did exist.]

Mr. CLARK resumed. I stand corrected. I did not voluntarily misunderstand the gentleman, but the course of his remarks induced the belief that such had been his intention. The gentleman, however, must allow him to make a single remark on the manner in which Cadets were introduced into the Military Academy. He seemed to suppose that the existence of that institution furnished, in itself, an evident proof of the correctness of his remarks that, ever since the days of Mr. Jefferson, the state of the country and of the Government had been growing worse. He spoke of the days of Mr. Jefferson as emphatically the days of our prosperity, but the gentleman surely knew that the Military Academy was organized during those very days. When the gentleman said that its benefits were confined exclusively to the sons of the rich and of the "well born," I do not know that I perfectly understood him. I had always supposed that all were well-born, who came of honest parentage. We have in this country no privileged orders. But the gentleman says, that none are admitted into that School, but the sons of the "well-born and of the wealthy." In this opinion, the gentleman is certainly mistaken. Unless I am greatly misinformed, (and I have my information through a very direct and creditable channel) nine-tenths of those who have been admitted, and are now there, are not the sons of wealthy parents. I admit, however, that they are "well-born;" for, not only are they the sons of honest parents, but a large proportion of them are the sons of officers and soldiers who fell in the Revolution and in the last war. If these are not fit subjects to receive the benefits of that institution, I am at a loss to conceive who ought to be so considered. Their parents were indeed poor, but they were honest and patriotic, and they shed their best blood for that liberty, and all those political blessings which the gentleman from Tennessee now enjoys, and which I hope he may long continue to enjoy. In the charge he made, he was certainly mistaken, and, if he will take the trouble to inquire, he will be satisfied of the fact.

In the specification of items of profuse Public Expenditure stated to the House by my honorable colleague, [Mr. DANIEL] there was one which I certainly did not expect him to make. He tells us that great abuses have taken place in the disbursement of the public funds to our diplomatic corps abroad. If that gentleman will examine the laws which regulate our Foreign intercourse, he will find that not a dollar can be paid out of the Treasury but by the force of law. The rates of the compensation of the different individuals are all fixed by the laws of the land. If he supposes that money can be paid out at the mere will and pleasure of the President, and of the Secretary of State, he is under a great mistake indeed. The law of 1802 fixed the salaries of all of our Ministers; and they are as permanent, and as uniform, and as much beyond the reach of Executive control, as yours, sir. How then, can there be any abuse? You may call on the President whenever you please, and he is bound to lay before you a full account of all that he has done on this subject. Did you not call upon him last session? And at the session before last? Did he not respond to your call? And did you pronounce that there was any thing wrong in the account which he rendered? If there was, I am ignorant of it. My colleague thinks that the public money was greatly squandered in the appointment of Rufus King to be our Minister to London, and insists that his mission was productive of no public benefit. What was the fact, sir? Mr. King was appointed Minister to that Court, by and with the consent of the Senate—he proceeded on his mission, and was taken sick in consequence—he returned home, and soon after, died. Sir, if the President is to be held answerable for the life and health of every Minister he sends abroad, I should be very unwilling to fill his office. As to the propriety of the appointment, it is not for me to give an opinion. There certainly could be nothing wrong in it, because it was submitted to the decision of the Senate and approved of by them. My colleague said, too, that, although we have had another Minister since, at the same Court, yet nothing has been effected. Sir, my colleague surely forgets himself. It has escaped his recollection that one treaty has been effected, by which $1,200,000 have been allowed us for slaves taken and carried away during the last war, and that, thereby, a very difficult and embarrassing question between the two Governments has been quieted to the satisfaction of all parties.

But, besides this, the boundary line between the United States and the British Colonies, so long a subject of discussion between this Government and that of Great Britain, has also been settled, and a treaty, defining that line, is now before the Senate for its approbation. The gentleman forgets all these matters. Sir, this is something—what more would gentlemen have to be done? Let them point it out. But the gentleman says we have lost the Colonial Trade in the West Indies, and this has been owing to the inefficiency of the Minister sent to England. Surely the gentleman has forgotten the recent statement we have had laid before us, shewing that this trade is more prosperous now than it ever was before. Sir, the merchants themselves—persons certainly best calculated to judge, and the most deeply interested in the matter, so far from complaining of what has been done, are daily reaping the benefits which have flowed from it. Gentlemen should ascertain the truth, and know the real state of facts, before they make charges such as have been introduced in the course of this debate. I have nothing further to observe, except to repeat that I am in favor of the resolution for an inquiry. I should, it is true, have preferred it in the shape in which it was originally offered—but I shall vote for the modification which the gentleman has substituted, to which, however, I beg leave to propose this amendment—that, instead of subdividing the investigation among the committees enumerated, the whole be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. CLARK, however, withdrew this amendment at the request of

Mr. BLAKE, who offered the following amendment to the resolution of Mr. CHILTON, as modified by the mover:

"Strike out all after the word resolved, and insert the following: That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into any abuses which have been, or may be reported to have been, committed by the President of the United States, or any of the Heads of Departments of this Government, in the disbursement of the public money; and whether there is any unnecessary number of officers employed in any of said Departments, and whether any of the said officers receive exorbitant salaries; and, if so, under what Administration the said salaries were created; and, if any, what, retrenchment is the public expenditures can be made, not incompatible with the public interest; and that the said Committee be, and is hereby, vested with full power to prosecute this inquiry fully, and with despatch."

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said, I am opposed to the resolution to to to. There is not a feature in it

Retrenchment.

which I should embrace, if left to my own views of the matter. It is not, however, my intention to enter into the discussion again. The feebleness of my health would forbid it, if there were no other considerations to restrain me. The House, I believe, will do me the justice to acknowledge that I never yet have intruded myself on their attention a second time, upon the same subject. I rise merely to support the allegation which I made, which, to my mind, is as irrefragable, as the rock of Gibraltar is immovable. I said that the benefits of the Academy at West Point are given to some of the well-born, and as the gentleman professes not fully to understand the meaning of that expression, I will treat him with a dissertation upon it. None can abhor the word more than I do: for this is a Government where merit ought to rise, from whatever station it may proceed. But the Government has converged; the poor and humble are looked upon as "canaille," to use an expression of the hon. gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] but the man possessed of thousands of dirty acres, (no matter how he may have got them) is regarded as a person of consequence and consideration! It is the sons of these, and such as these, who are called the well-born. But there is a species of people among us whom the Government has fostered, even on this floor, who esteem wealth more than they do all the knowledge, talent, and virtue, of a sage. I acknowledge that property is a great blessing when bestowed by the munificence of Heaven upon men of talents and integrity, who consider themselves as stewards for the benefit of society; but there are others, in whose hands property is one of the greatest of curses. I hope that the gentleman, by this time, has a full view of what I meant by the term well-born. Sir, I know of no such thing as personal distinction, under this Government. I see, indeed, an attempt at it, but that attempt is odious to me, and to all who think as I do.

Now, Sir, who are in this West Point Academy? One gentleman tells us that there is to be found the son of a widowed mother. Sir, I should be glad the gentleman would name him. I certainly never heard of such a one before. [The honorable member here named some of the youths who were at the Academy, whose names and parentage the reporter was not able to catch with sufficient distinctness to embody them in this report, commenting upon them as he went along.] Sir, I feel no enmity whatever towards those who conduct that institution. God bless them—they are in what they believe to be the course of their duty, and it is not with them that I find any fault. It is the institution which I hate, and I hate it for the reasons I have stated. From a district adjoining that of my colleague, there is a young man of wealth and splendor—but, Sir, this proud soul of mine shall be bent as low as that point of degradation to which the Government seems likely to bring us all, before a son of mine shall be brought there. Notwithstanding I have the same privilege with other members, I should deem myself unworthy of the confidence of the hundred thousand souls who have sent me here as their Representative, if I could use that privilege in favor of any son of mine. Sir, my colleague did me no more than justice, when he said that I usually speak with caution in this House. Sir, I never speak unadvisedly; neither is it my desire or intention to hurt any one. I am, it is true, the son of a corrupt and fallen race, but my conscience does not reproach me with ever designing to speak what is wrong. In what I said of this Academy, I spoke from data, as I hope the gentleman also did when he told us about the son of a widow who had been received there. I know him not, and I protest before Heaven and this House, that it is my sincere belief that no son of a forlorn and destitute widow has ever been received there. But when I speak of a forlorn and destitute widow, I do not mean a woman who has merely lost her companion in life; by that description I understand a woman depressed by poverty, who has a family to maintain, and who is compelled, by necessity, to drudge from the morning to the night, (like the unwearied ant) for her offspring. She is a forlorn widow, and I never yet heard of the son of such an one being recommended and admitted to the West Point Academy.

One word, sir, on the amendment. When the member from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON] first introduced his resolution into the House, I saw nothing in it which related particularly to this Administration, or to any other. In my apprehension, it had not even a squinting towards it. I thought that it was sincerely meant, and that it was such a resolution as became the Representatives of an honest People, and I believe that its adoption would be a benefit to the nation. I did think, and still do think, that a number of the officers under this Government might be dispensed with, although I well know that many must be retained. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLARK] has given to it a political cast; he wishes us to send to these officers, that they may declare whether they have received too much. They are to tell us whether the regalia of Government are necessary or unnecessary. Sir, will you come to me to inquire whether I have done any thing worthy of punishment? I should never tell you any thing which will condemn myself, nor would I ask such a thing from another. Why, then, has there been such a waste of time in repelling charges against the Administration? But, sir, whenever persons attempt to procrastinate inquiry into their conduct, it is very natural to suspect that they know of something wrong. I do not know that such is the fact; but I do know that Republics, like all other Governments, are prone to run into extravagance and profligacy. When I spoke the other day, in support of this resolution, I had no apprehension of the buzz that would arise on all sides of us. Sir, I was brought up in the State of Virginia, in the dark and eventful days of '98. I have been a strict observer of public men and public things ever since that time. I know very well when the Military Academy was established, as well as when the other breaches have been made upon our liberty. But if any thing which fell from me was considered as making war upon an Administration which is already borne down, I was greatly misunderstood. I have no such purpose. Where the error lies, there let the investigation search it out. But, for God's sake, let us leave alone this political dispute.

Mr. CLARK now rejoined. If I had thought there would have been any difference as to facts, between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself in relation to the Military Academy, I should not have referred to that subject at all. The intelligence I received, I considered as authentic. It certainly was direct: for I had it from two young gentlemen just come from the Academy. The gentleman alluded to the Cadets from my district. The practice, I believe, at present adopted by the War Department, is to allow the member from each district to select the Cadets from that district. I know of but two Cadets from my district. If the gentleman knows of four, it is more than I do. The admission of one of these was obtained by me, and he is the son of a poor widow, whose husband fell in the service during the last war. The other is the son of a man of very high talents, but of moderate circumstances. With this selection I had nothing to do. It was made by the two Senators from my State.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Pennsylvania, said, that he regretted that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR] had been put out of the view of the House, by the modification which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] had been pleased to make in his resolutions. He thought it more intelligible, and the language less exceptionable, than any one of the forms in which the subject had been presented to the House, and he was very sorry it had been put out of view. His honorable colleague [Mr. BUCHANAN] had objected to the amendment, because it did not embrace what he conceived to be a very important part of the original resolutions, relating to the extinguishment of the public debt. That as some gentlemen entertained doubts of the expediency of paying off the public debt, and believed we were discharging it too rapidly, it was all important that this paragraph should be retained. Mr. A. observed that, as the inquiry proposed to be made by the resolutions appeared to be predicated upon the supposition that it was expedient to discharge the public debt, it might be of importance to his colleague that this object should be placed in the front rank. But, as regarded the simple abstract question of the expediency of extinguishing the public debt, he thought that a vote of the House, establishing the fact, could be of no importance at this time. He did not believe there was a gentleman on the floor, who seriously entertained the opinion that a national debt was a national blessing, or that it would be unwise for this, or any other Government, to liquidate and extinguish their public debts as speedily as the means they possessed would enable them.

The supposed prodigality and extravagance of the Government for some time past, had afforded a rich theme for declamation throughout every part of the United States. Newspaper essayists had been clamorous on the subject. And where, he would ask, have we been told, we should find evidence of this prodigal expenditure of the public revenue? In the subordinate offices of the Treasury Department? No, Sir. Where, then, are we told we should find it? In the East Room. There, it has been boldly asserted would be found the glittering and costly representatives of thousands upon thousands of the public money. There, Sir, we have been informed, we should find the most incontestible evidences of the extravagance and prodigality of the present Administration. And what is the fact? After being led by curiosity, or by the glaring light of this ignis fatuus, to its pretended location, what do we find? Nothing, except a few chairs, apparently of domestic manufacture, and of little value. He would beg leave to ask, what had gone with all this costly furniture, if it ever was there? As that constituted a very important part of the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means, which devolved upon them by a Rule of the House, he had no doubt they would inform us. For the purpose, then, of ascertaining whether such an unpropitious state of things did exist, in relation to the management of our financial concerns, he was willing that the inquiry should be made, and that the fact of their existence or non-existence should be disclosed. If a disease so alarming, and so malignant in its character, existed in the body politic, let a prompt and efficient remedy be applied, lest, by delay, the disease should become incurable. If reform was necessary, let us go to work promptly. If retrenchment in all or any of the Departments was required, let the fact be speedily ascertained, and the remedy applied. If, on the contrary, it should be found, on inquiry, that no reasonable ground of complaint existed—that all the subordinate offices were indispensably necessary for the despatch of the public business—that the salaries of the officers and clerks were not extravagant—let the public know it.

All his deliberations on the subject had led to the conclusion, that, as all those offices, about some of which so much had been said, had been established by legislative acts—that, as the salaries of the officers and clerks were fixed by law, and graduated, no doubt, by a due regard, as well to the public interest, as to the nature and importance of the services to be rendered—it would be uncharitable in him to charge the Government with extravagance, unless he had better information, and stronger evidence of the fact, than could be derived from newspaper essays.

He should not, he thought, be passing a very handsome compliment, on the very able and highly distinguished predecessor of the present honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, should he be induced to make a charge so illiberal.

Mr. CHILTON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of entering into the argument. He would only offer a few words of explanation, and then wash his hands of the resolution. I am clearly convinced that my original motion has been entirely mistaken by a number of gentlemen on this floor. It was not intended either to whitewash or to pull down the Administration of my Government, nor to advance the interest of any great political aspirant, and I can assure gentlemen that I had not my eyes so particularly fixed upon myself, as to introduce this inquiry with a view of paving my way for a future return to this House. I had understood that abuses did exist, and that there was an extravagant expenditure of the public money. And lest this House and my constituents should suppose that I have in the least recoiled from the ground I took, I now declare that my opinion is still the same. I still believe that the People's money has been expended for what is wholly unnecessary. But the expression of my opinion might possibly not express that of the House, and being warned by many of my friends that this resolution would be more acceptable if its form was somewhat changed, I was induced to modify it in the manner which the House has witnessed. I hope, however, that this will not be considered as an abandonment of the ground I first occupied. It is not my present design to engage in a discussion of the merits of the proposition. As far as it might have been unwise to introduce such a resolution at the present moment, it is to me a subject of regret. But I never can regret it, when I take into view my situation, the opinions of my constituents, and the present situation of the People of Kentucky. If I have thrown a firebrand into this House, I regret it sincerely: for it has with great truth been said, that time is money, and it is possible that much time might have been saved if this discussion had not been introduced. I am certainly indebted to the House for the great attention they bestow upon my resolution, as well as upon my remarks, whenever I have made any. The principal objection to the length of the debate, is the consumption which it occasions of the money of the nation. I enjoy, however, the consolation of believing that I have consumed but about three quarters of an hour in all. For that I am responsible, and for no more.

Mr. BLAKE, of Indiana, said, that he returned his thanks to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON] for the kind feelings which he had expressed towards him. In relation, however, to the great political contest which now agitates this nation, I, said Mr. B. am acting on the honest conviction of my own mind; and as relates to the contest in this House, in so far as I may be concerned in it, it shall be conducted by me openly, honorably, and generously. I confess it appears strange to me that gentlemen should take exception to the amendment I have proposed. Surely, if any amendment was ever introduced into this House, which might be said to embrace the views of all, this is such a one. Do any gentlemen complain that there is extravagance in the expenditure of this Government? They will find in the amendment an inquiry respecting retrenchment. Do they think that the number of officers is too great? They will find that in this amendment, that also has been contemplated. If they suspect there has been any improper conduct on the part of the individual who is at the head of the Government, they will find it proposes an inquiry into that subject. Do they apprehend the existence of corruption in the heads of any of the Departments, whether of State, or of War, or of the Treasury, or of the Navy? They will find that all these are embraced by it. What were the views of the gentleman from Kentucky, in first introducing the resolution? Were they not directed to an inquiry? I certainly so understood him. If then abuses are to be ferreted out, if the saddle is to be put on the right horse, does not the amendment provide for it?—and that, sir, is the wish of the People. As to the reference of this inquiry to the Committee of Expenditures, I have no doubt, whatever, that the members of that Committee have sufficient talent, zeal, and patriotism, to perform this duty in a proper manner. But I prefer the Committee of Ways and Means, because I think them, from their situation, best qualified to institute such an inquiry. Could any gentleman hear the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman who presides over that Committee and not be satisfied that, if any person on this floor was intimately acquainted with the various modes of disbursing the public money under this Government, it was himself? I consider it as especially proper that the investigation should be made by that Committee, rather than by any other. From that gentleman's situation, as well as from his talents, he must be better qualified to prosecute it in a full and ample manner, than other gentlemen, who do not possess the same advantage. A report from that Committee will, I am persuaded, satisfy this House, and, what is of more consequence, it will satisfy the sovereign People. I have every confidence in the talents of that gentleman. They are known not only here—they are well known to the whole nation. And, from the high sentiment of honor he is known ever to cherish, from his frankness and generosity, and his capacity for application, I am persuaded a more proper reference could not be made. I now move you, Sir, that, when the question on the amendment is taken, it be taken by yeas and nays.

[H or R.]

The SPEAKER put the question on ordering the yeas and nays, and it passed in the affirmative. So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, I do not rise to prolong this debate, by entering into a general discussion of the subject. Sufficient time has already been wasted upon it. When it was first introduced to the House by the gentleman from Kentucky, I did not anticipate that it could have occupied so much of our time as it has already done.

My single purpose, at this time, is to notice an observation which was made yesterday, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WATSON] in relation to the Committee of Domestic Manufactures. This task I should not have undertaken, had the members of that committee been present in the House, either yesterday or to-day; because, we all know they are perfectly able to defend themselves. It is well known that they now are, and for a considerable period they have been, absent from the House, by leave, discharging the arduous and important duties which the House have thought proper to impose upon them. If the gentleman from Ohio had recollected this fact, he surely ought not have made the remark which he did.

The gentleman, in reply to a remark made upon this floor, said, he feared there was no danger that we should have a tariff forced upon us during the present session. That we had not yet heard any thing from the Committee of Manufactures, and his constituents feared we should not hear from them during the present year. The gentleman evidently intended to convey the idea to this House, and to the nation, that the committee were opposed to the great interest intrusted to their care, and wished to defeat the passage of any tariff during the present session. I ask what evidence is there, to justify the remark of that gentleman? When the House gave the Committee of Manufactures the power to send for and examine witnesses, one of the members of that committee distinctly declared, upon this floor, that they would report during the present month. The gentleman ought, therefore, in common justice, to have waited at least until the close of the month, before he began to complain. It will be time enough to charge the committee with neglect, when the period shall have elapsed, within which they avowed their intention to make a report.

I will inform the gentleman, that the members of that committee have faithfully and industriously devoted themselves to the performance of their duty. Their labor has been almost incessant. They have for some time been occupied not only during the whole day, but a great part of the night, in examining witnesses. When they shall make a report to this House, it will be one resting upon facts, not upon vague and contradictory opinions. It will convince all, that the House acted wisely in granting that committee power to send for persons. For my own part, I am firmly convinced, that the facts which the committee have collected, instead of retarding, will greatly expedite the passage of a wise and judicious tariff. They will serve to conciliate the enemies of the system, by furnishing them with convincing testimony, that domestic manufactures really do require additional protection. I have no doubt such a bill will be reported, as shall unite the gentleman from Ohio and myself in its support; although, during the present session, we have stood in opposition to each other, upon almost every other question. Upon this occasion, I shall be glad to embark with him in the same vessel, and I trust we shall have a prosperous voyage.

As the House appears determined to pass some resolution upon the subject now before them, I shall take the liberty of making a suggestion in relation to the Military Academy at West Point. It is chiefly intended for the committee who may have charge of the resolution.

I cannot agree with some of the gentlemen who have addressed the House, that the Military Academy should be abolished. On the contrary, this Government, possessing the power of making war, and being under a solemn obligation to provide for the common defence, owe it to themselves and to the People of this country, to furnish them with the means of military instruction. War, especially in modern times, has become an art, nay a science, so extensive and so complex in its nature, that its theory can only be acquired after years of application. A Military Academy is the best plan which has ever yet been devised of communicating military instruction. It is true that a few men, of brilliant genius, have appeared in the world, who, without a military education, by mere intuition, have excelled in the art of war. These splendid exceptions ought not to detract from the general rule that a military education is necessary to make a skilful and efficient officer.

Gentlemen have complained, and I believe with justice, that there now are several supernumerary Cadets. I would suggest the source of this evil to be, that the Military Academy is too large for the Army—or, any gentleman will have it so, the Army is too small for the Military Academy. A just proportion does not exist between them. The supply of officers which the Academy furnishes is too great for the demand of an army not amounting to 6,000 men. This state of things gives birth to another evil. No man who now enlists as a private soldier in the Army, no matter what may be his capacity, or what may be his conduct, can ever expect to be promoted above the rank of a petty officer. He can never indulge the hope, which the policy and the practice of the wisest nations have sanctioned, that he may one day become a general officer. Every avenue to promotion is closed against him by the graduates at West Point, who always have the preference, and are more than sufficient to furnish the army with officers.

Whether the Government, in addition to furnishing the means of a military education, ought to feed, and clothe, and pay the Cadets, whilst they are receiving it, is a question well worthy of the attention of the committee to whom this subject may be referred. One thing is certain, that, whatever other sins may be fairly chargeable against the present Administration, they cannot be justly chargeable with the establishment of the Military Academy.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, his principal object in rising was to return his thanks to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] on this side of the way, who has just taken his seat, for the information he had given him in relation to the Tariff and the Committee of Manufactures. I rejoice, sir, said Mr. W., at the assurance that the House may soon expect to hear from the committee, and to receive a bill; and, as one among the means of quieting the fears of my constituents, in relation to that subject, I hope to be able, this day, before the mail closes, to despatch the information West. The farmers and manufacturers in my district, sir, and in Ohio generally, will rejoice at receiving such cheering news. The gentleman, however, errs, in the supposition that I introduced the Tariff into this discussion. It was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLORENCE] and, in reply, I only adverted to the fears that had taken hold of my constituents. I rejoice that he has afforded even a small crumb of comfort for them. The gentleman errs, also, I believe, in the supposition that no one of the committee was here on yesterday to hear my remarks, and to reply. I may be mistaken, but I think some of the committee were here, heard what was said, and might have replied. I shall be pleased to go along with the gentleman in the support of a Tariff, and hope still to be able to accomplish something to relieve the great interest suffering for want of protection.

While up, sir, I may as well notice the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, in relation to this and other subjects. He has cautioned us not to attempt to force a Tariff upon the South, and assured us that his constituents and the People of the South will be forced to resist—that they will not submit. Well, sir, suppose they do resist, and will not submit, what then? Are we to disregard the importunity of our constituents? Is the Union to be dissolved? Will the gentleman and his Southern friends dissolve the partnership, and set up for themselves? Or do I do injustice to the character of the Southern People, in the supposition that they will submit, like good citizens, as they have heretofore done, to the laws Congress may see proper to pass on that as well as other subjects?

[Mr. CARSON rose to explain. He certainly did not intend that the Southern People would resist a Tariff deliberately passed; but he complained of forcing a Tariff by the use of the previous question, before they were ready for it.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. And, sir, if we are to wait the passage of the Tariff till the gentleman and his Southern friends are ready for it, then God help my constituents and the manufacturers! They are doomed to suffer, with no prospect of relief. The gentleman and his Southern friends will never be ready to receive the measure. The pill will always be bitter to them, and if we are to wait till they are ready to receive it, without the use of any force, our hopes are gone. Sir, this measure, I hope, will soon be introduced, according to the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and that we shall seriously engage in forcing it through this House, until we shall obtain our object, and then we shall see whether the Southern People or the gentleman's constituents will resist and dissolve the Union, or whether I do them injustice in supposing that, as heretofore, they will submit, as becomes good citizens, to the laws Congress shall deliberately pass. Sir, the gentleman from North Carolina has gone into a discussion of the constitutionality of a Tariff having for its object protection to manufactures. I will refer the gentleman to the first act of Congress under the present Constitution, fixing a tariff of duties, passed in 1789. In the preamble to that law, he will find, as one of the objects set forth as requiring the passage of the law, that of protecting and encouraging domestic manufactures occupied a conspicuous place. When the gentleman reflects who composed the Congress that enacted that law; when he shall recollect that it was composed of the heroes and sages of the Revolution, and of the patriots that framed our Constitution of Government—a structure which has secured our liberties and elicited the admiration of the world, he will, I trust, agree that I do not disparage his merits in saying that they understood the meaning and construction of the work of their own hands at least as well as he does. But, sir, I do not rest on this alone. I have another authority at hand—the opinion of one that, I trust, the gentleman will not question. On the 9th of January, 1816, Thomas Jefferson wrote a letter to Mr. Benjamin Austin, of Boston, on this subject, an extract from which I will read, for the edification of the gentleman from North Carolina, and I beg his particular attention to it. Mr. Jefferson says: "To be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. The former question is suppressed, or rather assumes a new form. The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or?"

[Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, called the gentleman to order. He asked if it was in order to discuss the Tariff on the present resolution?]

The SPEAKER replied, that the gentleman from Ohio was not discussing the Tariff, but replying to the arguments advanced by the gentleman from North Carolina, and was in order.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina for his supervision over me, and kind concern lest I should get without the rules of order. Mr. Jefferson says—"The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures, must be for reducing us either to a dependence on that nation, or be clothed in skins, and to live like wild beasts, in dens and caverns. I am proud to say, I am not one of these. Experience has now taught me, that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as our comfort." This, to me, sir, would be a sufficient authority, if I doubted of the constitutional power or expediency, which I do not. I hope I have removed the constitutional scruples of the gentleman from North Carolina, and this authority will tend to remove his doubts of the expediency of protecting manufactures. The gentleman and his friends have the alternative: will they protect manufactures, and make us independent of foreign nations, or will they sink us to dependence on foreign nations for our comforts and necessities, or drive us to clothe ourselves in skins, and to live like wild beasts, in dens and caverns? Let them choose which.

The gentleman from North Carolina has taken occasion also to animadvert upon a certain secret committee, with which he supposes I was some way connected. He said, in relation to another subject he discussed, that certain observations he had heard showed a profound ignorance of the subject. He will take no offence, I hope, if I adopt his own language, and say, that his remarks as to their matter showed a profound ignorance of the subject he discussed.

[The SPEAKER called Mr. W. to order, and remarked, that it was not in order to use personalities in debate.]

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that he was aware of that; but he said, I think, sir, it is in order to reply to personalities gentlemen have been allowed to use towards me.

[AN. 26, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. or R.]

The SPEAKER said, certainly; but the Chair did not understand the gentleman from North Carolina to make personal allusion to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he understood the gentleman so; and I appeal to the gentleman to avow or disavow his intention to give his remarks a personal application to me.

Mr. CARSON replied, that he had stated that it was probable that he might with propriety refer that gentleman to a committee organized here last Winter, denominated the Secret Committee, for an answer to his interrogatory; but he spoke of that committee from newspaper authority. The newspapers did refer to that gentleman, as connected with that committee.

The SPEAKER observed, that he had not understood Mr. C. as making a personal application of his remarks, or he should have called him to order.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. Sir, I say, the gentleman, in his assertions, to use his own language, showed himself profoundly ignorant of the subject. Sir, I never attended or belonged to any such secret committee; no list of any such committee was ever made out by me, and none such was ever published, so far as I know. I would advise the gentleman to use greater caution in advancing charges here.

The gentleman from North Carolina has presented, in formidable array, the payments to John A. King, as Charge d'Affaires at London—to J. H. Plessants, a Messenger employed in foreign service, and to the Secretary of the Panama Mission, and asks me and the House, is not here evidence of corruption and profligate expenditure in the Administration? Now, sir, what was paid to King, what to Plessants, what to the Secretary of the Panama Mission? Was the payment made to either out of the usual and ordinary course of such things in the Departments? I do not know. The gentleman has not told us. When the gentleman undertakes to specify his charges, he is bound to make them explicit; but I am in favor of inquiry, although I do not believe the abuse exists in these expenditures. But, sir, I was really surprised, when the gentleman was arranging and displaying his formidable array of profligacy, he should have been altogether silent on two subjects, with at least one of which the gentleman is supposed to have been familiar. I mean, sir, the expenditure of fifty dollars (not out of the People's money; no, sir, but from private funds) for an old billiard table,* and the expenditure about which so much has been said, in procuring the "gorgeous, splendid, and princely furniture of the East Room of the President's House." I was indeed surprised at these important omissions, and suppose they were accidental. The gentleman had spoken of the friends of the Administration who were opposed to the inquiry. Who are they? I am not one. I have supported the inquiry in its utmost latitude, and challenged the fullest investigation. Have any of the friends of the Administration opposed the inquiry? The gentleman has not himself supported the inquiry. He voted to lay it on the table—to stifle it in its bud. Among others who opposed the inquiry, and voted to put it on the table, we find the two gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. FLOYD] the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on this side of the way, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] These gentlemen will not feel flattered with being called friends of the Administration.

While I am up, I will take some little notice of the course pursued by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] who yesterday was in the way, but is now, I am sorry to observe, out of the way. That gentleman took occasion to say to the House, yesterday, that he had done with me forever. Why this was declared, I neither know nor care. When I discovered he had fallen into error as to a remark of mine, I rose and proffered to put him right as to the matter misunderstood, if he would yield me the floor. This was abruptly refused. I then promised to notice him on some future occasion, and this is that occasion. On at least two occasions this session, I have yielded the floor to that gentleman, at his own request, to permit him to explain, and once when the matter explained had no connexion with my remarks on the subject I was discussing. I complain not of the gentleman's refusal to return this common courtesy, to admit an explanation of an error connected with myself. It is not my habit to complain. Whenever it shall suit the high-minded and chivalric Representative from the Ancient Dominion to show himself less civil and courteous than the newest member of any Legislative body—let him do so. The gentleman may be assured of one thing, however—if he has done with me, I have not done with him. I assure him I am not to be got rid of so easily; and whenever, while I have a seat on this floor, in my opinion, it will subserve the interests of my constituents or the country, I shall take him and his arguments, and handle both or either, as I shall think fit and proper, keeping within the rules of the House, and he may get rid of me, as he can. The gentleman asked, with great emphasis, who has made this House an arena for political gladiators? Who has? I have never introduced a proposition into the House calculated or intended to elicit political warmth or discussion. I have not done the deed. The gentleman himself can better answer the inquiry than I can. Who has, time and again, here and elsewhere, entered into discussions tending to no other result than political excitement and animosities? When gentlemen having, as they now have, a majority, will introduce propositions of a political character, we have no choice, but must submit or discuss the best way we can. The gentleman seemed inclined to shift off responsibility from the majority, and throw it upon us; but that is not a work of easy accomplishment. He must take the responsibility he has obtained. He may give us as many "descantations,"—I use a word I heard from his own lips some years ago in this Hall, and which then troubled him much—as many descantations, on this subject, as he pleases, he cannot throw the responsibility of their measures on me, or those with whom I act. The gentleman, with much asperity, adverted to the votes of the present Chief Magistrate, while in the Senate of the United States, in reference to the acquisition of Louisiana. Is that, sir, one of the sins of the present Administration? One of the abuses this resolution is intended to remedy? If the gentleman will take the trouble to examine into the matter he alludes to, he will find I think, that the scruples and doubts of the present President on that subject, were of a constitutional nature, and connected with the exercise of the power to extend, under the Constitution, over Territories not within the jurisdiction of the United States when the Constitution was framed, and he will find also, if I mistake not, that all the scruples and doubts he entertained, were also entertained by Mr. Jefferson, through whose instrumentality the Territory was acquired. If these opinions furnish no evidence of hostility in Mr. Jefferson to the acquisition of Louisiana, how can they furnish evidence of such feeling in Mr. Adams? Much more—how do they afford evidence of the profligacy and extravagance of this Administration?

Treasury Department, Register's Office, June 2, 1827.

I hereby certify, that, in the settlement of the furniture account of the present President of the United States, there is not any charge made by him, nor payment made by the United States, for a billiard table, cues, balls, or any appurtenance in relation thereto; neither has there been any charge, or payment made, for backgammon boards, dice, or any appurtenance in relation thereto; nor for any chess boards, chess-men, or any appurtenance in relation thereto.

H. or R.]

Retrenchment.

[JAN. 26, 1828.]

In descending upon the situation of things here, the gentleman from Virginia has adverted to what he is pleased to term, the workings of an organized phalanx on our side of the House, and lamented the want of concert on his, and deprecated the introduction of propositions without consultation and agreement. He took occasion to admonish the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON] that young physicians should stand by and not attempt to administer medicine. Adverting to the success attending the efforts of the party with whom he acted formerly, he attributed their success to concert, consultations, and arrangements out of doors. Their young doctors did not introduce propositions the party did not approve of. Sir, what follows from all this? Will any gentleman rise in his place, on this floor, and say that the Legislation of Congress, in order to make it subservient to party purposes, shall be subjected to the control of a secret irresponsible caucus out of doors? A caucus that shall not only determine what propositions shall be introduced, but the time of their introduction, and the persons who shall be permitted to bring them forward, or advocate them? Are we to come to that? I trust in God, sir, that time never will arrive, and that no one will ever be found here hardy enough to avow such a purpose. But, sir, if the time ever shall arrive, and the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman, shall avow such a plan, and attempt to bring it into practice here, that he will meet the indignant frown of the House and the nation, and be put down forever.

I have attracted the notice of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who, a short time since, occupied a position near the door, but is now I know not where, [Mr. KREMER] and I may be expected to pay him a passing notice. That gentleman has altogether mistaken the side I advocated, in ranking me among the opposers of the measure, which I should not have supposed he could do, unless he were asleep when I spoke. Sir, whenever that gentleman rises on this floor to "cry aloud and spare not," although his remarks have not the charm of novelty to recommend them, being made up of a set of words and phrases, which, with a little alteration, are made to suit all occasions, yet there is something in the matter and manner so infinitely farcical and amusing, both to myself and the House, that I cannot find it in my heart, by any reply of mine, to interpose the slightest obstacles in the way of exhibitions, affording so much entertainment to all around me.

Mr. KREMER, of Pa., said, in reply, I ought to thank the gentleman from Ohio for being so greatly amused by me. I wish I could return the compliment by saying, that I was either amused or instructed by him. But it was the reverse: for he never speaks, but he reminds me of an old hen, who is eternally cackling, cackling, and never lays an egg. I have now done with the gentleman.

Mr. CARSON spoke in reply to Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot regret any thing that has fallen from that gentleman; he can say nothing which can affect me. I am perfectly secure from his malignant shafts—

[Here the SPEAKER interposed and reminded Mr. C. that such remarks were out of order.]

I submit to the Chair—I was only replying to the remarks of the gentleman which had a personal bearing upon me. Sir, I do not regret being profoundly ignorant of all that gentleman's secrets, and of all his secret movements, and thus for causes which it would be out of order to mention, and which I therefore leave to be inferred. The gentleman regrets that I had not enumerated among the items of profuse expenditure, the disbursement of $50 for an old billiard table. He says that that item was not paid out of the public money. I must be permitted to correct him. It was paid for out of the public money—out of an appropriation made by this House, and to deny it is to utter a libel on the President's Private Secretary, and on the committee who reported the account of those disbursements to this House. Sir, I have once noticed this item, and, as appears, with more effect too than that gentleman is gratified to learn. When the account of those $14,000 was rendered, it struck me as of a most extraordinary character, particularly those items about the billiard table, cues, chess men, &c. If it be true that these sums were not taken out of the public money, whose fault is it that such an impression was made here? I proceeded on the evidence of the documents before me, and I now hold in my hand the official report of a committee of this House, containing the official statement of the Private Secretary of the President. Sir, what are these items? Permit me to read them, for the purpose of refreshing the honorable gentleman's memory.

Mr. CARSON then read from the report of Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, No. 122, made the first Session of the Nineteenth Congress:

"Letter H contains the official report of Mr. John Adams, jun., Private Secretary of the President," in which are the following items:

"To Lazare Kervard, for a billiard table	- $50 00
"To Littlejohn, for cues	- 5 00
"To Pishey Thompson, for chess-men	- 23 50
&c. &c."

And I particularly call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to these items, in order that, when he goes home, he may be enabled to state the truth to his constituents.

Sir, no young gentleman deserves more credit for the accuracy with which his accounts are kept, than the Private Secretary of the President. He first charges himself with the amount of the appropriation, $14,000, and then he proceeds in the most exact and regular manner to detail the items on the opposite side of the account. Even the dates of the receipts are stated; and he concludes by striking a balance, in making up which, these items of billiard table, chess men, &c. are included.

Now, what is the part taken by the Administration in defence of these items? I thought it was extraordinary, after having just received $14,000, they should ask the House for $25,000 more; and when this application came before the House, I stated, as a reason for opposing it, the improper manner in which the appropriation already granted had been expended, and remarked upon those items as set forth in the account. This gave rise to a good deal of conversation about the billiard table.

The President has said, as I am informed, by a letter written by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN RENSSELAER] that this item in the account was a mistake, and subsequently, when the settlement of the $14,000 came to be made at the Treasury Department, they caused those items to be stricken out, and got a Mr. Nourse to certify that no such items were contained in the account. Thus meanly skulking from the responsibility of what gentlemen now affect to consider a very insignificant matter; and by their own course they have really given the subject more importance than it originally deserved. But, sir, their accounts and certificates will avail them nothing. The account is here as officially rendered by the President's son. It is in the archives of the nation, from which the gentleman from Ohio would, I doubt not, gladly have it expunged.

Sir, as to the furniture of the East Room of the President's house, it has been suggested that I was the author of a certain letter on that subject, to the editors of the Richmond Enquirer. Sir, this is not true; and so far from it, that Mr. Ritchie, senior editor of that paper, voluntarily stated to the contrary. I am not in the habit of writing to that gentleman. I do not personally know him; nor did I ever write to him in my life. I take his paper, and derive from it both satisfaction and instruction, and I here bear willing testimony to the ability with which it is conducted.

As a young man just starting in political life, I am naturally anxious not to do, or to be thought to have done, any thing that may justly forfeit the good opinion of any gentleman in this House. But I must be allowed to say, that I do not wish the good opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, if, indeed, he is physically capable of entertaining a good opinion of any of his species.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said he was sorry to be obliged to rise again in this discussion, nor should he have done so, had he not been so particularly called upon by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] to specify instances of the misapplication of the public money. I am sorry, sir, that all I have to say will not be new: for I believe that the gentleman and his friends are pretty well acquainted with most of the items on this matter. It is said that some of these errors in disbursement are chargeable on this House, since we have ourselves voted for the salaries of the officers. Sir, it matters little whether the extravagances in this Government are under a law, or under the discretionary expenditure of a contingent fund, it is equally proper and necessary that an inquiry should be made into them; and I am persuaded that, if every member should be enquired of, "Do you know that there are any wasteful expenditures?" he would reply, "I have good reason to believe that there are." This opinion has been given by members of this House and of the other branch of the Legislature, and has been circulated all over the United States. A certain Mr. King who edits a paper in New York, (a gentleman near me says it is his brother who is the editor—it is not very material) a paper in New York which supports the Administration, was sent out as Secretary of Legation, when his father was appointed Minister. As to the father, I know very well the President is not accountable for the death of the Ministers he sends abroad, or for their sickness—but this old gentleman was sickly when he went out, and to oblige him, this son of his was sent as his Secretary of Legation. But the old gentleman did enjoy a little spell (if I may use that expression) of good health, such at least as one might have supposed would allow him to do some business; and if the Administration had thought it a matter of any great consideration, one would think they might at least have furnished him with instructions. He must not therefore, be charged with all the blame of what followed. When he returned home, he left his son as Chargé de Affaires at that court, and he was allowed a salary, or an outfit and part of his salary, while he remained in England, in violation, as I think, of an express law of Congress, which requires that, in such circumstances, the Secretary of Legation must be commissioned by the President as Chargé, and his appointment approved and ratified by the Senate. Instead of observing this law, Mr. King himself appointed the Chargé, and on that appointment he received the money for outfit, &c. I do not recollect that any appropriation was asked of this House to pay the item. I could say more—Mr. John H. Pleasants, a gentleman who edits a paper, in much esteem, as I suppose, with the gentleman from Ohio and with all those who are most ardent in support of the administration, is said to have got $1,900 out of this fund.

[Mr. WRIGHT explained. He had never said or thought such a thing. I only asked the gentleman from North Carolina to state the specifications of his charge against the Administration, and he mentioned this subject. I never said any thing about it.]

Mr. FLOYD resumed. Certain it is that he did receive $1,950 for carrying out a message to Buenos Ayres, and that he never arrived there. A member from New York informs me that he went to England, and that he saw him there.

Sir, unless all the records of the proceedings of this House are erroneous, the paper I hold in my hand may be considered as of official authority. It is the Report of a Committee of the House; but the report of one Committee has been denied by the gentleman from Ohio, when referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON.] I don't know how he arrived at his knowledge. It is possible the fact I am about to state may be liable to the same objection. In the Documents, vol. 9, No. 120, of the years 1821-22, there is one from the Department of State, dated on the 30th April, 1822, and signed John Quincy Adams—which document contains this, to me, most extraordinary statement. "To Russia, John Quincy Adams, from 5th August, 1809, to 27th February, 1815, outfit, $9000; salary, $50,100; contingencies, $5,153 54—total, $64,657 54." Afterwards, "To Ghent, John Q. Adams, from 29th April, 1813, to 27th February, 1815, outfit, $9,000; salary, $20,299 31; contingencies, $6,345 60—total, $35,345 60." "To Great Britain, John Q. Adams, from 28th February, 1815, to 10th June, 1817, outfit, $9,000; return, $2,250; salary, $20,546; contingencies, $3,005 62—total, $24,801, 62." Making a grand total of $104,804 76

I hope the gentleman will not deny this statement. I do not complain that every man should make his own living as he can; but I do not consider it disgraceful to observe something like economy. I do not know how to account for this statement—perhaps the gentleman can explain it for me.

In the session of 1826-7, a gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WHIPPLE] submitted a resolution for the printing of the land laws of the United States. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEXHAM] thereupon moved, that the Clerk of this House should be directed to receive proposals for the work. His resolution was adopted. But, on the last day of the session, (when I am told the House was very thin—I was not then present,) and by almost the last motion that was made, the gentleman from Ohio obtained the rescinding of this order to receive proposals, in consequence of which the printing of the land laws was executed in the same manner, and on the same terms with the other printing of this House; and by which motion, this House paid for the job some thousands of dollars more than it would otherwise have cost us. For what purpose, I will not say—possibly the type and paper were better.

I will now dismiss the subject. I am willing this investigation shall go on. I must observe, however, that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BLAKE) is not such as I think likely to be followed by any beneficial results. The resolution, as modified by the mover, is such as will throw some light upon the subject, and I do hope it will be adopted, without amendment.

Mr. WHIPPLE said, he considered himself called upon by the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, to explain to the House the course which had been taken by the Committee on Public Lands, to procure a revised and improved edition of the Land Laws, the want of which had been seriously felt by that committee. The former Chairman of that Committee (Mr. SCOTT) had on the 5th of January, 1826, moved a resolution, instructing the Committee to "inquire into the expediency of authorizing a new compilation of the resolutions, treaties, compacts, and laws, in relation to the public lands of the United States." At an after date, (March 1st, 1826,) Mr. W. said, he was instructed by the Committee of which he had the honor to be a member, to report a resolution, providing for the compilation in question. The Clerk of this House was charged with the duty of making the compilation, and the expense was ordered to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. But the work was directed by the resolution to be laid before the House at its next session, for inspection and examination before its being printed; nor would the print ing be executed without a further order of the House. At the next meeting of Congress (on the 26th of January, 1827,) Mr. W. said the volume in question, which had been previously presented by the Clerk, was, on his motion, referred to the Committee on Public Lands. On report of the Committee (19th February, 1827,) this House was called to act, when a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGRAM] moved an amendment.

The Committee on the Public Lands had, upon the most mature consideration, come to the conclusion, that, to perfect the work, and make it as useful as practicable, it should be printed under the immediate inspection of the officer of this House, who had compiled it, and so provided; and ordered the expenses to be defrayed out of the contingent fund of the House, relying wholly upon the integrity of that officer so to direct the business as to best effect the end designed, and at the same time pay a due regard to economy in effecting it. The committee saw no reason, to doubt the integrity, zeal, or ability, of that officer, nor have they since had reason so to do, nor did they apprehend, that they were compromising the public interest by the course which was recommended.

The motion to procure the printing to be executed by contract, however, prevailed, and the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was adopted. The committee, aware, at that time, of the difficulties which would be thrown in the way of the execution of the work by this mode, opposed it—they were over-ruled by the House, and submitted to its decision. But, sir, on further and more full inquiry, the committee were so fully convinced that the work would necessarily be imperfect if executed in the mode ordered by the House, that a gentleman, not of the committee, was solicited to use his influence with the House, to procure a revision of so much of the resolution as directed the printing to be done by contract; founded on the proposal of the lowest bidder. On motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARREN] the House rescinded the objectionable addition which had been made on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. And thus, sir, the work is now to be done under the immediate direction of a responsible officer of this House. In this, the gentleman from Virginia sees corruption, but why, or wherefore, Mr. W. said he was wholly unable to perceive.

But, the gentleman says three or four thousand dollars have been lost to the nation by this revision of a part of the resolution referred to. Sir, how is this possibly known to the gentleman—the book is not yet printed! The Committee on the Public Lands have, during the present session, experienced the want of it, and would be extremely pleased to witness its completion; it is, however, but justice to say, that the Clerk of this House has made every exertion to complete it, and is still pursuing the object with all practicable assiduity. The work has been found to be one of great labor. The treaties, laws, compacts, Spanish regulations, and a mass of other matter, which will form a heavy index to the volume, do not lie within a narrow compass, and cannot be taken by intuition, as the gentleman does the scent of corruption in every gale.

Now, Sir, having explained this very mysterious matter, as is hoped, to the gentleman's satisfaction, permit me, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. W. to take a passing notice of the question in debate—the resolutions, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BLAKE.] The original mover, as well as all who have attempted to improve the resolutions by amendments, have seemed anxious to effect retrenchments in the expenditures of the Government. If, sir, this be the purpose aimed at, there need be little difficulty in effecting the object. Are not the party, sir, now in possession of the power of this House, fully prepared at every point for the onset? You have, sir, your Committee on Public Expenditures—your Committee on so much of the Public Accounts as relate to the Expenditures of the Department of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Post office, and on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Public Buildings. These Committees have all been organized by the presiding officer for this House, who has been elevated to his present station by a majority, and the respective committees, each, has a majority, or at least a supposed majority, selected from the same side of the House. Now, sir, is not the House fully organized according to the most approved plan for purifying the corruptions of this proscribed Administration? And will gentlemen shrink from the use of the power which they thus have at their disposal? Is it just, is it open and ingenuous, to attempt, by insinuation and indirection, to induce the belief among the People that there is corruption and extravagance, whilst at the same time we shrink from the labor and responsibility of sustaining charges? Sir, I will never be induced, by any legislative forms, to adopt a course like this. If gentlemen wish to push their inquiries into the Departments, they shall have my aid. I never have refused, nor shall I probably ever refuse, to inquire into any alleged misuse of power. I have no belief that the most rigid investigation will touch, in the most remote degree, the integrity of the Administration: but should it result in that, let the Administration fall. Errors, slight and trivial, may exist; it would be singular if they did not exist. Errors of judgment may be supposed; but then who shall decide, under all the circumstances, whether the judge or the judged are, or have been, right? Within Constitutional limits, this House is the inquest of the nation; and, if gentlemen suppose the existence of mal-administration, let them take the responsibility of openly and boldly substantiating the fact, and they will then acquire a just and lasting fame with the American People: but, sir, to insinuate and shrink from responsibility, to traduce our rulers by indirection, has not, nor ever shall be, my course.

The amendment proposes to send the whole subject to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee, sir, have as much to do as their time will enable them to perform, and, sir, I cannot be induced to believe that the public good requires that this resolution should take that direction. Sir, I am disposed to vote to remove this question from before the House, and would then call upon the Committee to do their duty. Some days since, the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALKER] introduced a resolution, preceded by a number of whereases, followed by suspicions of corrupt and extravagant expenditures, which terminated in a simple call upon the chairman of one of the committees of the House to inform us whether that committee could do its duty; we have not, to my knowledge, yet been informed, whether its duty will be attended to or not.

Why then continue these insinuations of extravagance and waste in the Administration? Is it for political effect out of this House, when responsibility is to be shunned in it? Sir, I will not impute so base a motive. The committees of this House are already organized so as most effectually to secure to the majority all the political consequence, all the influence among the People of this Union, to which the party having the power is legitimately entitled, according to the constitution of this House. Let it be used, and let the party be responsible for its use.

Mr. JOHNSON, Chairman of the Committee on Public Expenditures, stated to the House, that that committee had been industriously engaged on the subject referred to them under a resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WALKER] and that, in a few days, they hoped to be ready to report.

Mr. FLOYD said, that he had understood the gentleman from New Hampshire as saying that base insinuations had been made by those who shrunk from responsibility. If that remark was intended for me, I say that the remark itself is a base insinuation, and as such I hurl it back in his teeth.

[Mr. FLOYD was here called to order by the CHAIR.]

Mr. WHIPPLE. Has the gentleman taken my words? I said, sir, I would not impute base motives, nor did I intend to insinuate that the gentleman from Virginia had made base insinuations. Sir, the very circumstances of resentment which accompany the gentleman's demand for explanation, show the necessity of our abstinence from imputations of corruption, bargain, and intrigue, in wholesale. Sir, it is degrading to us individually, it is debasing in the eyes of the world; it weakens the confidence of the American People in the stability and firmness of their republican institutions; it lowers us in moral and intellectual elevation, to be continually holding each other up in this Hall, and our National Administration too, as guilty of the basest and most mean peculation; exalting our partizans, and debasing our adversaries in politics; to be passing constantly from the extremes of honor to the extremes of baseness; to be made, in the same hour, the "wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

Mr. FLOYD said he was glad to be put right. He was sorry he had not understood the gentleman correctly at first. He could not have expected, from the tenor of that gentleman's conduct heretofore, that he would be guilty of any violation of decorum toward any on this floor. Expressing his regret for having on this occasion, misapprehended the gentleman, Mr. F. went on to say, that he was perfectly aware of all the respect which was due to the Executive Department, and to all public officers, as well as to the dignity of this House and to his own. But when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARE] had called upon him to specify the manner, in which the gentleman "clear over the way" had done, he felt it his duty to state what he believed was the fact, that there had been a great misapplication of the public money. And surely, when a member of this House has a suspicion that the affairs of the Administration can be conducted in a better style, he has a right to advocate an inquiry, and, although it should turn out that the contingent fund had, in some cases, been applied very improperly, he was not, therefore, going to say, upon the first blush, that there was corruption in the Government.

Mr. DORSEY, after adverting to the various modellings and re-modellings which the original resolution, as well as the amendment, had undergone, and on the necessity of further time for a right understanding of the precise nature of the question presented, concluded a few preliminary remarks, by offering the following amendment (going to enlarge the inquiry) to the amendment of Mr. BLAKE. To insert, after the word created, these words, "if the compensation allowed to the Members can be reduced consistently with the public interest."

Mr. BLAKE accepted this amendment as a modification of his own.

Mr. DORSEY then moved to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table, and print them, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, who said, he had hoped not again to have asked the attention of the House in this debate. But the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLOYD] had done him the favor to point out several specifications of abuses and extravagance in this Administration, in pursuance of his request yesterday, for which he thanked him, and would endeavor to reply to them. The gentleman [said Mr. W.] has set forth in his specifications the appointment and allowance to Mr. King, as Chargé at London; the allowance made to Mr. Adams while Minister to St. Petersburg and at Ghent; and the proceedings in this House the last session, relative to the printing of the land laws, and in which I had a personal agency. As to the first: Our Minister to London was taken sick, and asked and obtained leave to return home. His son was Secretary of Legation; not appointed by the father, but by the Senate of the United States, on the nomination of the President. No complaint was made that he was not qualified. The undeviating practice of the Government had been, when a Minister left a Court to which he had been sent, before a successor arrived, to leave some one in charge of our diplomatic affairs; that charge had, perhaps, always been devolved upon the Secretary of Legation, a public officer who had charge of the records and documents of the mission, and supposed to be familiar with the concerns of the mission. Mr. King followed this custom, and left his son, the Secretary, in charge of our affairs. Does this furnish evidence of profligacy and abuse in the Administration? I am not acquainted with Mr. King, or his competency; but I cannot find evidence here either of the profligacy of the present administration, or any departure from the usual and ordinary course of proceeding in such cases. If the gentleman views this affair differently, why did he not vote with me for the inquiry, and not vote, as he did to lay it on the table, with the avowed purpose of putting an end to it?

I will proceed to the second specification—the allowance to the Minister at St. Petersburg and Ghent. The gentleman here refers me to a printed document, by page and date, and hopes I will not dispute the authority of that, as it has affixed to it the name of John Quincy Adams. The document bears date in 1822, and specifies certain allowances made before that time. Now, the gentleman and I were here together at the commencement of the present Administration, and his own memory will show him that this transaction was of anterior date to the present Administration, and for services rendered long before, and he must see that they are referrible to a former Administration, not to this. I will not delay to examine the items, or the propriety of the allowances in the document; but if the gentleman does not know, I will inform him, and I speak advisedly when I do so, that the account referred to in the document, was never made out in the form there stated by Mr. Adams and signed by him; the information on this subject has heretofore been before this House. It was made out by some of the clerks in the offices, to conform to their mode of settling accounts, without the knowledge or sanction of Mr. Adams, who never did, nor never would, present the account as there stated. Not only, sir, is this transaction referrible to a former Administration, and of anterior date to this, but is of anterior date to the time limited in the resolution of inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, and supported now by the gentleman from Virginia. If he really desires to extend this inquiry back to a period embracing this transaction, he must vote for the amendment. The time limited in the resolution is the first of January, 1824. Let us go back and have the whole matter examined into. I will cheerfully go with the gentleman.

With regard to the third specification—the printing of the Land Laws—in which the gentleman implicates me. You have been told that this transaction, which cost the Government several thousand dollars, was got up on the last day of the session, when there were but few members here, on my motion. The gentleman himself was then, and for some time before had been, absent from the House. I see no entry of leave having been given him to absent himself from the service of the House, though he may have obtained leave. Why was he absent from his place? Why was he not here attending to his duty, guarding against these profligate expenditures? I know not. I have, indeed, seen in the newspapers, which gentlemen seem willing to refer to, accounts of certain dinners, and dinner speeches in Richmond, about that time, in which we are told of certain "combinations" being nearly completed, and arranged for efficient operation. Perhaps the gentleman—

[Here the SPEAKER called to order. He said personal remarks could not be permitted.]

Mr. WRIGHT said he had understood the gentleman from Virginia had impugned his motives, in reference to the vote here, and he had been permitted to go on. He only sought to reply.

The SPEAKER said he had not so understood the gentleman from Virginia.]

Mr. WRIGHT said, Sir, I will explain this printing transaction, I trust to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Virginia.

[Mr. WARD called the gentleman to order.]

Mr. WRIGHT took his seat.

Mr. WARD said he was of opinion, when a gentleman was pronounced out of order, he forfeited his right to the floor.

The SPEAKER replied, he had called the gentleman from Ohio to order, and he had acquiesced in the decision, and resumed his argument in order.]

Mr. WRIGHT was about to resume, but gave way at the request of

The SPEAKER, who rose, and addressed the House. He felt, he said, very deep regret at the personal and unpleasant character which the debate had assumed, and which, if continued, was calculated to have a baneful effect upon the character and deliberations of the House. The SPEAKER certainly could have no wish to restrict improperly, the freedom of debate. He had never attempted it; he never should; but at the same time he felt it a duty that he owed the House, the nation, and himself, to interpose the authority of the Chair in maintaining the order and dignity of the House, and in repressing personalities and recriminations, which could produce no other effect than deep excitement and personal altercations. In the eagerness of controversy, and the commotion of debate, it was often very difficult for the Chair to interpose successfully its authority in preserving order, and limiting debate; in cases of great or unusual excitement, it could never be done, without the most prompt and vigorous co-operation of the House. In making these remarks, the Chair intended no allusion to any particular member of the House. He had risen to impress upon the House the necessity of enforcing order, and sustaining the Chair, and to intreat gentlemen, who might be disposed to mingle in the debate, to refrain from personal and recriminating remarks towards each other, and to confine themselves to the subject under consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. I trust I should be one of the last men in the House to violate the rules of the House. I perfectly accord with the view of the Chair. I certainly have to thank the gentlemen from New-York for his endeavors to keep me in order. Just before the close of the session, the resolution for printing the Land Laws, with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. IREMAN] passed. I was in the House, endeavoring to attend to my duty; but the first intimation I had of the adoption of the resolution, I obtained in the morning papers. Having had occasion, shortly before, to examine the Joint Resolution of 1819, which had the effect of a law, which any gentleman curious to look at it will find in the 6th volume of the laws of the United States, page 444, I supposed the House had inadvertently adopted the resolution. Acting under that impression, I doubted if—no, sir, I knew—that this House could not repeal a law of the United States. When I made the motion, and stated the objection, that the resolution contravened the joint resolution, the House unanimously rescinded that part of the resolution. What should have been done? The House had inadvertently committed an error. It was my duty, apprised of it, to inform the House. I did not neglect that duty. But, sir, the construction upon which I acted, and which the House confirmed, has another sanction, which I hope the gentleman from Virginia will admit as authority. Another deliberative body in another part of this building, resolved to proceed to the choice of a printer to the body. Several ballotings took place, and an adjournment took place, with the declaration of the body that no choice had been made. At the commencement of this session of Congress, that body determined the construction of the joint resolution as I have done, though I think with less forcible application to that case, than in the case in this House. Under that construction, it was determined that an election of Printer was made last winter, notwithstanding the separate resolution of that body, which was declared a nullity. It is by virtue of this construction the Printer of that body now holds his office. Sir, if the resolution specified by the gentleman were not so accounted for, I am unable to see how it could be brought forward as a charge against this Administration. I have yet to learn how the President and his Cabinet can be chargeable with a unanimous resolution of this House. If it evidences profligacy and extravagance, it is in us. We should be content to bear the stigma, and set on foot a reform here.

Mr. DWIGHT said, he would occupy the attention of the House but for a very brief space; he knew their impatience, and the lateness of the hour, and should not have risen at all, but in consequence of the very extraordinary conclusions drawn by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLOYD] from the document which he now held in his hand. Now, sir, said Mr. D. I draw from the evidence (and have do doubt the House will do so) a conclusion directly the reverse of that of the gentleman from Virginia. He has stated that large and unusual allowances were made to, and accepted by, the present Chief Magistrate, for his services while representing this country abroad. Since the gentleman sat down, he had run his eye over the paper alluded to, and could assure the House that the document out of which the charge was made, contained in itself a most ample refutation of that charge. By a comparison of the payments to Mr. Adams with those made to many, and he believed all our Ministers in Europe, it would appear that, so far from the allowances made to the former being unusual, they have in no instance exceeded, and in many have fallen short, of allowances under similar circumstances, and for a proportionate length of time, to our Ministers, under different Administrations. How, indeed, could it be otherwise? The House would recollect that the salaries of Public Ministers, like all other salaries, had been long since regulated by a law of Congress, and the discretion vested by that law in the President, in regard to the outfit, was expressly limited in amount to a sum not exceeding a year's salary. The charge, then, touches not only the person who is supposed to have received, but the disbursing officers of Mr. Madison's Government, under whose Administration the money must have been paid out, and he appealed to the candor of the gentleman to correct an error so injurious to all affected by it.

He would ask the attention of the House for a few moments, to the grounds of the comparison he had alluded to:

It will be seen by the Document

Mr. Barlow received, for a little more than a year and a half in France, $ 33,000

Mr. Monroe, for about five years, at England, France, and Spain, 81,679

Mr. Gallatin, for about six years, in France, and at Ghent, 94,112

Mr. Pinkney, at Great Britain, Russia, and the two Sicilies, about seven years, 109,661

Mr. Adams, at Russia, Ghent, and Great Britain, from 1809 to 1817, about 8 years, received 119,915 in, in 1801, for which he received $5,110, an amount which would increase the aggregate sum paid to him, much less than the mission increased the time occupied, and the moneys disbursed in the public service. The allowances to our Foreign Ministers may appear to some gentlemen to be too large, but they ought, in vindication of the policy of the law under which those allowances are made, to recollect, that it is a service of the highest confidence, requiring the most distinguished talent of our country, and that the Courts of Europe, to which they are sent, have none of the Republican simplicity and economy of our own. Their allowances to their Ministers are in all instances greater, and in some, treble and quadruple ours. It had become proverbial, that no Minister of ours could live in Europe, without trenching upon his own funds. The account, then, though large, is not one of moneys paid to enrich the individual, but of moneys expended by him in the public service, and he was persuaded that not a dollar of it has remained in his private coffers.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WRIGHT] had alluded to, but had not specified a mistake in the document. It was in the computation of the time at Russia, extending to 1815. This, he presumed, was a mere error of the press, as it was well known that Mr. Adams was transferred to Gottenburg, and subsequently to Ghent, in the Spring of 1813.

By inspecting the recapitulation on the last leaf of the document, it would be seen that the error does not come into, or affect the aggregate sum which he had previously named.

MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1828.

RETRENCHMENT.

When the House adjourned on Saturday, a motion had been made by Mr. DORSEY, to lay the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, together with the amendment thereto, on the table; and, on that question, the yeas and nays had been ordered. But, on the opening of the debate this morning, before the yeas and nays were taken, Mr. DORSEY withdrew his motion, and the question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. BLAKE—

Mr. BUCKNER, of Kentucky, said, that, when the original resolution was offered for the consideration of the House, he was prepared to give his vote, and, indeed, anxious to do so without any discussion. Even after his colleague [Mr. CHILTON] had explained the motives by which he professed to be influenced in its introduction, and the objects he had in view, he should have pursued the same course. It required no great foresight to anticipate the course which the argument, if persisted in, would take, and the great difficulty there would be in circumscribing it within its proper limits. It was apparent, that it could not lead to any valuable result. I was unwilling (said Mr. B.) to see this Hall converted into a theatre for crimination and recrimination; for that course of bitter invective, and unmeasured abuse of public men and measures to which the debate had already led, and with which the newspapers have been filled for the two or three last years. Such a course, sir, should always be avoided, and, more especially, in the Congress of the United States—where, if there be dignity in deliberation to be expected in any legislative body on earth, it might be hoped to be found. In the few observations which I shall submit, it is my intention to make no remark calculated to offend, or to give rise to ill feelings. They shall be confined to the subject-matter of the resolution, except so far as is deemed proper to depart, for the purpose of answering insinuations thrown out, or charges made against the present Administration. In doing that, however, I shall not so unnecessarily consume the time of the House as to answer each separately. It would be considered as an insult to enter into a labored argument in explanation of this stale matter, about a billiard table, balls, cues, and chessmen. Nor, sir, is it at all important to inquire how many copies of the Virginia Address have been sent by gentlemen of this House to their constituents. It has never been my practice, and it never shall be, to enter the folding room, as it is termed, to ascertain what papers or documents have been franked, and forwarded to different States, by this or that gentleman. They send such only, it is presumed, as it is believed will be acceptable to their constituents, and calculated to enlighten the public mind. It forms, in my opinion, no ground for censure; and, if it did, an ample set-off would be found in the fact, related to me a few minutes since, that at least an equal number of copies of a pamphlet, purporting to be an exposition of the principles of the Adams Family, have, in the same manner, been forwarded by some gentlemen of the Opposition party, to their constituents. Nor, sir, shall I put myself to the trouble of making, or you the pain of listening to, a tedious defence of the conduct of the President, in relation to the charge made against him, of receiving a large sum of money, for his services as a Minister, many years ago; or of his nomination of Mr. King, as our Minister Plenipotentiary to England; or of the fact of Mr. King's having left his son there, as a Chargé d'Affaires, on his resignation; or of the money paid to Mr. Pleasants, of Virginia. After the facts are established, and they are not denied, in what consists the impropriety of conduct in either of those affairs? In the reception of the money alluded to, for services, as a Minister, did Mr. Adams receive more than others have received for similar services? It cannot be pretended that he did. And, if he had, he had not the control of the office in which those accounts were settled. If there be any thing wrong in that affair, others would be suspected, whose integrity is as far above suspicion, as even that of the President himself. The nomination of young Mr. King, to act as a Chargé d'Affaires, temporarily, was in strict accordance with the practice uniformly pursued, under previous Administrations, by others similarly situated, and which was never, I believe, on any former occasion, complained of. The charge of impropriety respecting the money received by Mr. Pleasants, will be found to be utterly without foundation, whenever the facts relating to it shall be investigated. But these matters appear to me to be entirely irrelevant in this debate. If, however, they must be inquired into, let us have the proof, before a sentence of condemnation be pronounced. The People of the United States have too high a sense of the sacred principles of justice—there is too much intelligence among them to permit our Chief Executive Magistrate to fall a victim to unfounded suspicion and idle insinuation. When crimes are imputed, or charges of improper conduct made, they will inquire when, where, how, were they perpetrated? It is easy to accuse; in these times of high party feeling, we must expect it; but nothing short of proof will satisfy us. For my own part, I am not only willing, but anxious that every ground of complaint shall be thoroughly examined. When that shall be done, this Administration shall have no cause to blush. They need not dread the judgment of a magnanimous public, dispassionately pronounced. Indeed, it should be matter of great consolation to them that this inquiry has been instituted. They have much more to apprehend from the abandonment of it.

A few words in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLORN] as to the style of dress prescribed for our Ministers at foreign Courts, and the expense incurred. That gentleman is surely misinformed, if he supposes that the Government has to bear any portion of that expense. It is taken from the pockets of the Ministers. The rule alluded to, moreover, so far from increasing the splendor of their appearance, and adding to the magnificence of the gorgeous apparel, formerly used on such occasions, was adopted for the express purpose of diminishing the expense, and bringing it more within the limits of republican simplicity. I have now done with this part of the catalogue of charges, thrown together without order or method, and prepared without the shadow of proof, making, altogether, the most ludicrous political hodge-podge that was ever offered to the amusement of any grave deliberative body, in this or any other country. Let me now call the attention of the House to the resolutions and the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. CHILTON] in explanation of them.

I have said that, when offered, I was prepared at once, and willing to aid the proposed inquiry. Yet, candor compels me to declare, that such a vote would not have been founded on any belief, or even suspicion, that there were such abuses as those pointed out. They may be: if so, they are not within my knowledge. As a friend of the Administration, there was no option allowed me, as to my vote. We occupy an entirely different attitude from gentlemen of the Opposition. If they will exhibit accusations, and get up debates, however useless, by which that time is consumed which should be devoted to important business, it is not our fault. Situated as we are, it could not reasonably be expected that we would refuse to meet them. What was the resolution, in substance, as originally offered? That the national debt should be speedily paid off; that, to effectuate this, a general retrenchment of public expenditures should be resorted to; that the number of officers employed in the public service should be lessened, and the salaries of those retained, diminished. In support of this, it was said by the mover, that there were sinecure offices, that we had departed from the republican simplicity of our ancestors; that the public money had been uselessly squandered, &c. Now, sir, whilst I admit that the public debt ought to be discharged at as early a period as possible, without detriment to other great national interests; and whilst willing to vote for an investigation of the alleged prodigality, I neither sanction it as correct, or concur in the gentleman's argument. After all that was said by him, in general terms, about profusion, national bankruptcy, &c. what were his specifications? That the services of the Fifth Auditor might be dispensed with, the occasion for which that office was created having long since passed away. That our tables were every morning piled with useless documents, and reports as long as the moral law. Whilst he seemed to imagine that, to the gentlemen of the South and the North "rocked in the cradle of ease and luxury," this would be considered as a matter of little moment, in the West there was but one voice concerning it. Whatever, sir, there may be of prodigality of public money in this matter, it savors more of any thing else than luxury. But, if the gentleman so estimates it, let me assure him, that, throughout the session, he will have it in his power to indulge his appetite in all the luxury of a most delectable variety. Reports, and the testimony upon which they are founded, must be printed and laid before us, to enable us to determine correctly such claims as are presented to Congress. They are cases in which redress can be obtained, and justice done no where else. Many of them are for very large amounts of money or property. In such cases, are we to act blindfolded, and attempt to dispense justice at hap-hazard? Surely not. If, in any particular case, any gentleman believes that it would be useless or improper to print them, when the motion is made to have them printed is the time to oppose it.

The selection of the Fifth Auditor, as an officer whose services might be safely dispensed with, was, perhaps, as unfortunate as could have been made. My colleague was informed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKNER] that, so far from the correctness of the supposition, that the occasion, for which that officer was appointed had passed away, his duties, within the last two or three years, had doubled; and, indeed, even he, whilst giving this information, was himself informed of other important and arduous duties, in relation to all the contracts for light-houses, which of late years have devolved on that officer. What, then, was the course pursued by my colleague? He enters this Hall the next morning, and informs us that, of the officers whose services, in his opinion, could be dispensed with, he would name, as honorable exceptions, the Third Auditor, the Fifth Auditor, and the Postmaster General. And, lest his meaning might be mistaken, it was repeated more than once.

Yet, he thought that some of the Auditors were unnecessary, but he could not say certainly which. Some one of them must go to the wall. To use a Western phrase, to take the scalp of an Auditor seemed to have been determined upon, and it must be had; no matter which, so that you touch not the Third, nor the Fifth. Sir, whenever it can be shown that any of them are useless; that he is receiving a high salary, or even a low salary, without performing essential services, I shall heartily co-operate with my colleague in voting that the office be abolished.

His opinions upon the subject of the additions to our revenue, derived from the sale of public lands, were not less amusing. If, said he, we can barely wade now, with all that source of revenue, what are we to do when that shall be entirely cut off? Yet, afterwards, in reply to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] so far from considering it as a source of revenue, I understand him to say, that they brought the Government in debt—that the amount annually expended upon them exceeded that which was received from their sales.

[Mr. CHILTON rose to explain. His colleague had misunderstood him, both in relation to that and in divers other points. He had represented him as having particularized, in his speech on introducing the resolutions, the Fifth Auditor, as an officer who ought to be discontinued. It was true, that, in his remarks, as reported, he was made to say this. But he had a distinct recollection that he had spoken only of the Auditors in general. The gentleman had also misunderstood him as to what he had said in reply to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES.] I did not say that the expenditures on our public lands were a source of nett revenue to the nation; but that an annual appropriation was asked for and was made, to meet the expenses of those lands, and that this expense prevented them from being looked to as a lasting source of revenue. I am certainly under obligation to the gentleman, for the remark that my proposition contained a political hodge-podge—

The SPEAKER here called Mr. CHILTON to order, saying that the remark had not been directed personally to him.

Mr. CHILTON then, after expressing his hope that what he had said would be distinctly understood by the House, took his seat.]

Mr. BUCKNER proceeded. I was pleased, sir, to afford to my colleague on opportunity of making his explanation. I repeated the substance of his remarks, as reported both by the Intelligencer and the Journal; and had, therefore, reason to believe that the remarks had been accurately reported.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said, during this debate, that, although the doctrine that a national debt is a national blessing, has not been openly avowed, it had been strongly hinted at: and we are told, also, that the doctrine was becoming fashionable, that we are paying off the National Debt too rapidly. Sir, if it be the fashionable doctrine, I have not heard it, nor is it my doctrine. It is not the doctrine of this administration. So far from it, every effort has been made to diminish that debt as rapidly as possible. May I not rely with confidence in support of this assertion, upon the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who acknowledged that the Sinking Fund had been fairly applied to the purpose for which it was created, and that the debt is rapidly diminishing? My opinion is, that every consideration of true policy, of public good, requires its speedy extinguishment. But I am not willing to admit, that the only mode of effecting that most desirable object, is, by diminishing the number of officers employed in the service of the Government, and lessening the salaries of others. We have resources which may be safely and confidently relied upon, and which, if not mismanaged, will, in a few years more, prove effectual. We have heard much said, within a year or two, about direct taxes. It was said by another colleague of mine, [Mr. DANIEL] that the proposed duty on woollen goods would operate as a duty on their importation, the consequence of which would be, that we must resort to direct taxes. This is not the first time, sir, that we have heard those evil predictions. When the Tariff Bill of 1824 was under consideration, this Hall resounded with similar prophecies. The time has rolled on; nearly four years have elapsed; we still hear the same declaration repeated, but have experienced no necessity of raising revenue by direct taxation. So far from that is the fact, that, since the commencement of the present administration, in little more than three years, about thirty-three millions of dollars have been applied to the payment of the public debt, and about twenty-three millions have gone towards the extinguishment of the principal. Let it not be forgotten, moreover, that, whilst this reduction has been effected, all the proper expenses of the Government have been met. Our foreign intercourse has been kept up, extensive preparations made for such internal improvements as may be considered of national importance; large amounts for stock in various associations, for the completion of such objects; and in one instance, even in the ancient dominion of Virginia, have been subscribed by the General Government. Our Army has been kept up, and our Navy increased. Not a single important interest has been neglected; and yet we have no direct taxes. There is not the slightest prospect of our being compelled to submit to such an evil; unless, indeed, despising the wisdom of the counsels by which we have been hitherto led, we subject all to the hazard of some dangerous experiment. If, then, it be asked, why vote for an examination into supposed abuses, where none exist, my answer has already been given. No good can grow out of the inquiry, so far as it relates to a diminution of unnecessary expenditure. The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. McDUFFIE] whose opinions on the subject are certainly entitled to great weight, has said, "that the true mode of effecting reforms, really and extensively beneficial to the country, is not by lopping off public officers with an indiscriminating hand, and curtailing salaries without a due regard to the importance of the duties for which they are paid." He has, moreover, said, that, with regard to the number of officers under this Government, and their salaries, the present administration cannot be fairly made responsible, but to a very small extent. He asks (I do not give his precise words) why we begin the inquiry where there is nothing wrong, and therefore nothing to rectify?

Yet, sir, I am not at all disposed to censure the gentleman who introduced the resolutions. He did so, no doubt, under honest convictions of their propriety—he had seen these charges of extravagance, of corruption in the disbursements of public money, repeated so frequently, in a thousand different shapes, in the newspapers, by Editors in various parts of the United States, from some of high standing, down to the curs of the very lowest degree, until he began to believe there must be some truth in it. However zealous a man may be in his pursuit of truth, even falsehoods may be repeated in his hearing so frequently and confidently, that at last they are received as truths. 'May I not now be allowed to indulge the hope, that my colleague has become satisfied, that he entertained most erroneous conceptions of these matters? Else, why has he so entirely abandoned his original resolution? Sinecure offices, high salaries of officers, the unnecessary number of them; the high per diem allowance to members, seem to have been forgotten, and we are now invited to inquire as to the manner in which the money appropriated for Foreign intercourse, and for the contingent expenses of the Executive Departments, has been applied since 1824—yes, sir, since 1824. There lies the secret. All errors, if any, committed before that period, are not worth investigation. They would shed no valuable light on the subject. The occurrence has passed by, and is no longer of any moment. It would be of no service in suggesting the propriety of any change in the law on the subject. Very well, let the inquiry be so limited. I am willing to go back as far as they please; to commence, and to stop, where they please. Should there be any thing wrong in the management of the affairs of this Nation, by this Administration, let it be made appear. If it be an error of the head, a magnanimous and generous public will scorn to punish; if it proceed from corruption, it will show that they ought no longer to be trusted. When proof of this is produced, none will be more ready than myself to pronounce a verdict of guilty. But idle suspicion, and worse than idle rumour, shall never influence my judgment.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, turn my attention to some remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] He expresses great anxiety that the House should get rid of this matter. I have already expressed my willingness to do so; and the reasons which prevented me from giving my vote with that view. We have heard something about the difficulty encountered in effecting concert of action among those with whom he is politically associated, whilst the opposite party take no leap in the dark. His words, I believe, were, that "I see one of the parties, with the very great man to whom he before alluded, perfectly willing, no doubt, to throw upon us the responsibility for whatever is done here, sitting perfectly still, steadfast, silent, and demure, bringing forward no proposition whatever; I see the other party throwing out proposition after proposition. The opposite party never commits itself, until after a night's reflection." If these remarks were intended to apply to the case which the gentleman was discussing, I must remark that he has certainly not attended to, or that he has forgotten the manner in which the resolutions have so far progressed. Does not that gentleman know, that, when they were first offered, and the gentleman who introduced them had given his views on the subject, you, Mr. Speaker, immediately announced to the House, that the period allowed for the consideration of resolutions had expired; and that we were then to commence upon other business? And so immediately after the gentleman who had been speaking had taken his seat, was this announcement made, that some of the reporters ran into a mistake, in supposing that he had not concluded his remarks. What opportunity, then, had the friends of the Administration to express either their views on the resolutions, or to vote for them? I will not say that there has been any anxiety on the side of either party, as a party, to avoid the proposed inquiry. Yet, the expression of opinion on the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] to lay it on the table, with the avowed design of disposing of it for this session, forty-seven only voting for it, and of that number, (I believe only six Administration members) would afford a better pretence for charging them with such a design. There is, however, no such charge made. Candor would not justify it. They acted, no doubt, from honest convictions of the propriety of the course which they pursued.

H. OF R.]

Retrenchment.

[JAN. 28, 1828.]

We were told by the same gentleman, [Mr. RANDOLPH] that he would oppose any and every party who would impose on this country any man as its Chief Magistrate, besides him who receives the greatest number of its votes. Is our Constitution then a dead letter? Can a man conscientiously discharge a duty devolving on him in the election of a President, violating neither the letter or spirit of that sacred instrument, and yet be subjected to censure? That must be the gentleman's opinion: for no man elected by Congress, can have received a majority of the votes of the People; otherwise, the election would not have devolved on Congress. I was truly surprised to hear such sentiments avowed; and the more especially, as coming from such a quarter. When, on the last election of President, that matter was before Congress, I understood, and still understand, that every member from Virginia voted for Mr. Crawford, except two, of which two the gentleman [Mr. RANDOLPH] was not one. It is to be presumed that he did not vote for one man, and wish another to be elected. He was in earnest as to the vote which he gave, and was, no doubt, anxious for Mr. Crawford's election. And yet, according to his present declarations, he would then have imposed on this country, a man, as its Chief Magistrate, who had not received a majority of the votes of the People; yes, and would now, upon the same principles, had he been elected, been found opposed to his administration, for that reason only, if not for other reasons.

He seems to labor under a conviction, that, under this Administration, there is much to censure, and great abuses to correct; but he will not work like a galley-slave at the oar, when the helmsman who steers the ship can, at any time he pleases, run it on a shoal. And is this his course? Is this correct doctrine—that a member of this House, elected by his constituents to aid in the deliberations of the national councils, shall give no aid in effecting even desirable objects, because he did not obtain his choice in the election of a President? Because there is a helmsman steering the ship, who may (not who has) run it upon a shoal! Will he refuse to correct what he seems to consider as alarming evils, because it may be prevented by the weight of the Executive? When did the present Executive interpose his influence to prevent the correction of any errors or abuses? Were he to attempt it, does not every man of common sense perceive, that it would at once prostrate him? It cannot, therefore, be imagined, that he would venture on such a step. But the gentleman is content to remain in the minority on this question; he was in a small minority under the first of the present dynasty. May I be permitted to enquire of him, under what Administration, at some period, he was not in a small minority? He has never known but one Administration in which the Chief Magistrate was willing, in good faith, to give up the Executive patronage, and that was the first of Thomas Jefferson. What would he say about the last Administration of that great man? Where was the gentleman then found? Was he in the small minority of which he now speaks?

The gentleman seems unwilling to afford an opportunity of saying any thing to sustain a sinking cause. "He should call on the present men in power for nothing which would enable them to affect the question, now at issue, between them and the United States." "It would be a call on those who had been improperly put in power, to protect their political lives." Shall insinuations then be made, shall charges be levelled against the Administration, and is the gentleman unwilling to hear them speak in vindication of their conduct? Are these his views of justice? If it be a sinking cause—if they are drowning men catching at straws, let them at least have a fair trial.

The gentleman is willing to correct abuses, but this is not the proper period to commence. We have heard it iterated and reiterated from various parts of the House, that this is not the accepted time. When will that glorious period arrive? Each moment, it seems to me, would be an accepted time to commence so good a work. No, the gentleman wishes to pass the appropriation bills, and go home. Shall we then pass those bills in the shape in which they are usually passed, and go home, thereby putting it in the power of the very men, who, if we credit the suspicions entertained, are abusing the confidence reposed in them, to continue those abuses? Surely not.

To expedite the approach of this most desirable period, when we can commence in good earnest, and without the fear of being foiled in our attempts, at reform, the gentleman wishes all the strength and force of his party, all the rays of their light, brought into a focus, and made to bear on this single point. Although he would not indicate more plainly than he had done, what period he alluded to, a Yankee could no doubt guess it. When it arrives, he would have us to believe that all will go on smoothly; every abuse will then be corrected; no weight of the Executive Department will throw in an obstacle. Mr. Speaker, the People of the United States are not to be gulled by this kind of cooing. This kissing of the People, this mode of winning the hearts of men, has been practiced from the earliest accounts of electioneering which we have in history, sacred or profane. "O that I were made a judge in the land, that every man that hath cause or suit might come unto me, and I would do him justice." It has worn thread-bare. There is not a yeoman in the country so ignorant that he cannot read through it as through a cobweb.

The gentleman speaks of the Administration party here as a disciplined phalanx. Let me tell him, sir, that it is not here alone he will have to contend against what he terms a disciplined phalanx. They are to be found in every part of the Union, and if I do not most egregiously misconstrue the signs of the times, in the gentleman's own State, he will have to contend there with force strong in number, and powerful for talents and respectability. There is yet much to be effected, before this greatly desired period shall arrive. I believe that it never will. I pray most fervently that it never may arrive. But, sir, if in this I am deceived—Ah me, Mr. Speaker! it will be a sad day; not for you, sir, but for many who now hear me. Not that I feel any deep interest in it. It is very certain that I shall never witness it. No, I do not wish to be here, to witness the long faces and the wry faces, which on every side will be exhibited. I have long since made up my mind, in such an event, not to approach nearer to HEAD QUARTERS than did a certain gentleman from Maryland, during the last war, to the enemy—a gentleman at one time well known on this floor, for his worth and his humor, who said, that, as they approached, he got almost to the top of Chinquepin Hill, and peeped over at them. If, however, I should change my determination, in relation to this matter, and be disposed under such circumstances to visit Washington, it would be an indulgence of curiosity, sheer curiosity, to behold the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] completely happy—(for I delight to see others happy, even when not so myself)—in the entire prostration of those abominable political heresies, which infect certain parts of the United States, and manifest themselves in a wish to see the cause of Internal Improvements flourish, and that their Domestic Manufactures should be encouraged and protected against foreign competition—heresies which, it seems, have, for years past, disturbed his repose by day, and haunted him in visions by night, striding before his disordered imagination in shapes more terrific than did the evil genius of Brutus, before him, when it told him, "We meet again at Philippi." I say it would be matter of curiosity to see the gentleman, for once in his life, satisfied with himself and all around him, exclaiming, in the fullness of his heart, for he often favors us with long quotations from the Latin Classics :

"Dens nobis hæc otia fecit;
Namque erit ille mihi semper Deus. Illius aram, Sepe tener nostris, ab ovilibus imbuat agnus."

But I may be answered that this cannot be; that it would be too glaring a departure from, too palpable a contradiction to, sentiments once entertained, and opinions expressed, on the same subject. No matter, sir. Let it produce no surprise. It will all be entirely natural; for, in proportion to the hardness of heart of an impenitent sinner, is always the zeal manifested after conversion. I will detain the house no longer.

Mr. WASHINGTON said, it was not his intention to have participated in this debate—already too much protracted—but, having expressed to some of his friends the intention of voting against the resolution, and having been induced by subsequent occurrences, to alter that determination, he conceived it due to himself, and to that character for consistency which it had ever been his pride to maintain, to assign briefly the reasons which had induced him to adopt a course different from his first intention.

When the resolution was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [said Mr. W.] I had resolved to vote against it—not that I was opposed to retrenchment or the reform of any abuses which might, by possibility, exist in the Administration of the General Government, but because I did not believe that any valuable results to this nation could grow out of such inquiry, and because I did not then, nor, do I now imagine, that any abuses exist, which require the intervention of this House, or which this inquiry is calculated in any manner to reform. I considered it merely as the redemption of a pledge, which the gentleman from Kentucky informed us he had given to his constituents. But in the latitude which has been allowed in this debate, sentiments have been expressed by gentlemen, distinguished for their talents, high in the estimation of the public, and high in the confidence of their party. What are the declarations they have made, Sir? That this is not the time for reform; that the clouds which now obscure the political horizon must be chased away by the rising of another and a brighter sun—an evident allusion to the election of another President—that you have nothing to hope for or expect from the present Administration, in aid of your patriotic exertions to effect reform. Sir, the imputation has gone forth to the world, under the sanction of high authority, that abuses, if not corruption, does exist, and that any attempt at their exposure would prove unavailing, as you could expect no co-operation from the rulers of this nation, who are thus pronounced too corrupt, too much wedded to their own sinister views, to make any sacrifice for the good of the nation. So far, Sir, we have heard nothing but allegations, without the semblance of proof: for all the evidence which has been attempted to be produced, has been ably met, and triumphantly refuted, without the aid of any inquisition.

Sir, I believe this Administration to be as pure, as patriotic, as devoted to the interest of the nation, as far removed from the suspicion of corruption, as any which ever has, ay, Sir, and as ever will preside over the destinies of this Republic; and that, like gold, the oftener assayed, the brighter it will shine. Sir, the Administration fear no inquiry or scrutiny, however rigid, either in relation to the disbursements of public money, or the discharge of the duties appertaining to their offices; neither do their friends entertain a fear on their account. On the contrary we invite and challenge the fullest and freest investigation: and, in accordance with this belief, I would with great deference, suggest to my friends—political friends I mean—for I have the pleasure of claiming many personal friends on this floor, with whom I am not politically associated—that every amendment should be withdrawn which has been offered by them, and that we afford to the gentleman from Kentucky every facility he can desire, by adopting his original resolution, or the modification offered by him, as he may prefer. This is not an inquiry of our seeking, and let us not put it in the power of gentlemen to say that we frittered down, or in any way embarrassed the inquiry they had proposed. Let the whole responsibility rest where it should. For my own part, I will vote against every proposition, either in the way of amendment or substitute, which does not originate with the gentleman from Kentucky, or his political friends.

One word, Sir, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, in relation to the institution at West Point, and I am done. Having recently had the pleasure of attending an examination at the Military Academy, I will take the liberty of stating the impression made on my mind by that visit. Without having enjoyed the advantages of foreign travel, and of making a comparison of this with similar institutions of other nations, I will venture to assert, that, in regard to discipline, and indeed the whole economy of its arrangements and conduct, it is not excelled by any institution in the world. Sir, it is a noble monument of the liberal and enlightened policy of this Nation. It richly deserves, instead of reprobation, the fostering care and protection of the Government. Young men, from every State of this widely extended empire, are brought together at West Point. They there form friendships which remain through life; local jealousies and prejudices, which unhappily exist among us, are conquered; and the associations growing out of this friendly intercourse has a most imposing influence in a political respect, by drawing more closely the chain which binds together this great Confederacy. It is true, Sir, the selection of Cadets is not confined to any particular class of society; nor can I perceive any just reason why it should be: for this institution was created for the benefit of the whole community. Yet the gentlemen assert, that none but the well-born are allowed to participate in its advantages, to the exclusion of the sons of Revolutionary fathers and widowed mothers; but one fact, sir, is worth a thousand such assertions: For I myself, within the last year, have had the pleasure of procuring for the deserving son of a poor widow in my district, a warrant of admission to that school; and I could instance to the gentleman from Tennessee, many appointments of a similar character—one particularly, in this District, of the son of an old Revolutionary officer and poor widow, to whom the present Secretary of War promptly gave a warrant. But, sir, no censure can attach to this Administration in relation to that establishment; it being almost co-eval with our Government. I therefore will not consume the time of the House by any farther reference to the remarks of the gentleman.

Sir, if it can be shown that the President of the United States, or any of the officers of this Administration, have been faithless to the trusts and obligations imposed on them—that they have wantonly or improvidently expended the public money, I will not raise my voice here, or elsewhere, to shield them from the just indignation of an injured people. Nor will I now attempt to defend them against insinuations, which, like an ignis fatuus, has neither shape nor substance; but if charges are to be preferred, let them come out in a tangible form—it will then be time to meet them.

Having, as I trust, relieved myself from any possible charge of inconsistency—being my principal object in rising—I will again, before I take my seat, suggest to the friends of the Administration, whether it will not be better to withdraw all amendments offered by them, and suf-for the gentlemen to frame such a resolution as will meet the object they profess to have in view.

Mr. CHILTON then again modified his resolutions by adding to the first as follows :

"And whether it is not expedient to reduce the pay allowed to the Members of the House."

And by adding the following as the fifth resolution :

"5. Resolved, also, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of applying the funds of the Government to a more speedy extinguishment of the National Debt."

Mr. BLAKE then modified the amendment which he proposed on Saturday, so as to take out of it that part accepted at the instance of Mr. DONNER.

Mr. INGHAM said, we are so apt to be led astray from the question before the House by incidental remarks, made in the course of debate, that it requires some effort to get back to the real and proper subject of discussion. I consider it, said Mr. INGHAM, most respectful to the House, as well as most compatible with the discharge of my duty, at all times, to confine myself as much as possible to the discussion of the matter immediately before it. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky had reference to a general retrenchment of the public expenditures of the Government. As now modified, it comprehends the whole of the original purpose, and goes somewhat further; but, in neither aspect, does it involve the great political question which now agitates the country. It was, therefore, out of time and place for the friends of the present Administration to throw themselves into the discussion by a general defence of their favorite Administration, before it was charged. The resolution makes no such charge, nor have I heard any made in debate, until the gentleman from Indiana, upon an assumption of his own, that the character of the Administration was to be tried by the proposed enquiry, demanded specifications, and entered upon a general defence. It was that course of debate which had led to this wide and unnecessary discussion. The resolution before the House simply proposes a retrenchment of public expenditures, without reference to the period when such a measure became proper or necessary, and no one will deny that some retrenchment might be effected; but it by no means follows that the Administration would be assailed by such a measure. Another part of the enquiry proposes a specific enquiry as to the expenditure of certain sums of money placed at the disposal of the President and Heads of Departments. We all know, that, when the law prescribes the special application of public money, there cannot be much danger of a misapplication; but where large sums are disbursed at discretion, it is, to say the least of it, a fit subject for the scrutiny of this House, and may fairly be done, and has been done over and over again, without any imputation against the Administrations who have made such disbursements; if all has been done right, they can have no just objection to the scrutiny; if any thing has been done wrong, we have a right to know: for, in either case, the information may be useful to direct future legislation. Let us look, for a moment, into the amount of the sums that are placed at the discretionary disposal of the President and Heads of Departments. The proposed inquiry goes back, I believe, three years. The sums appropriated for the contingencies of foreign intercourse, for that time, are as follows: 1825, $40,000; 1826, $40,000; 1827, $30,000—$110,000: this is the fund out of which the President may, by law, cause to be paid what amount he pleases, and if, in his opinion, the public interest requires it to be concealed, he certifies that fact to the accounting officers, and they settle the account without specification, or any other voucher than the certificate I have mentioned. It is proper that we should know what sums have been thus settled at the Treasury. I would not invade any regulation which may have been found expedient, especially in times of war and difficulty, but the resolution does not call for the specification, it only asks for the amount so expended. The remainder of this fund, and the appropriations for the contingencies of foreign missions, and the contingent expenses of the several Departments, are required, by the resolutions, to be specified, and to this there can be no reasonable objection. The amount appropriated for the "contingencies of missions abroad," for the last three years, is $70,000, and for the contingent expenses of the Departments $211,845, making a total sum of $391,845, including the foreign intercourse fund, which is disbursed very much at discretion. Now, sir, if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should be adopted, it will exclude us from any knowledge of these large disbursements. But let us consider what his amendment proposes to do in place of the enquiry contemplated by the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky. The first proposition of the amendment is to enquire whether any abuses have been committed by the President or Heads of Departments, and what can that end in? Shall we send a committee to the President, to ask him what abuses he has committed? He will tell them in the first place that he does not confer with committees, and in the next, that he is not conscious of abusing his trust, and is not bound to answer that question. Will you send a committee to the Heads of Departments to put the same question to them? Will they give you any such information, after you have thus characterized the object of your enquiry? But perhaps it may be said your committees might go to the Clerks. Do we not know, that, at the last session, a certain transaction leaked out, which excited some attention both here and abroad, and afterwards became the subject of a motion in this House—I mean the payment of $4,500 to John A. King, for a benefit, as it has been aptly called. I never knew nor enquired how it got out; but soon after it was noticed here, we heard it as a fact of common conversation in this city, and for myself I cannot doubt it, that the Head of one Department summoned his trembling Clerks before him, and menaced with immediate dismissal whoever could be proved to have made the disclosure. In such a state of things, what could be expected from an enquiry after abuses? It has been well said by the gentleman from South Carolina and others, that it must end in nothing. The next object embraced in the amendment is an enquiry as to the reduction of salaries, and as to what offices can be dispensed with, and if any salaries are found too high, under what Administration they were established! And, according to the form of the issue made up by the gentleman from Indiana, the decision of these points is to try the character of the Administration! What, sir, test this Administration by the ascertainment of a fact, which, no matter what it may be, cannot affect the Administration in the slightest degree? It was certainly an ingenious contrivance of the gentleman to put the trial on such grounds. If the salaries should not be deemed too high, nor any offices to be dispensed with, the Administration would be acquitted and entitled to our support; but if some reduction and diminution should be thought proper, then the next point presented by the gentleman, is, when were these offices and salaries established? And if it should be found that they were established before this Administration came into power, which we may all know by looking into the Statute book, then the Administration would be acquitted. I, for one, will not consent to any such a trial, and will here admit that the Administration are not responsible for the amount of the salaries—these were established by law—nor for the number of officers, whose offices are created by law; nor for the time when they were established. If the gentleman, by his ingenuity, could get such a trial as he has proposed, he would get his Administration out of their difficulties most easily indeed. I am not disposed to be drawn into the discussion of that question, nor to any trial of the Administration before this House. We might indeed be compelled to put public officers upon their trial in some events, but we have no right to try them ourselves, but most especially, I would not take the great political trial now going on before the People out of their hands. It would be most unwise, as well as irregular, for this House to entertain jurisdiction of any question upon an appeal from the People. I came here to assist in transacting the legislative business of the country. This House is not competent to decide that great political question by any act which can grow out of these resolutions. Why, then, bring this discussion here? Let it remain, I beseech gentlemen, before an intelligent People, where some, perhaps, of the most intelligent bodies of men ever convened for such occasions, are discussing the subject with eminent ability. But, sir, if forced into this discussion against my will, I would admonish gentlemen that we will not try it upon the salaries of a few officers, or their number, or dates, nor upon the amount of the wages of members of Congress. We must go much deeper. We must go to the origin, and enquire how they came into power. Whether the spirit of the Constitution had not been violated in the election. And in tracing their acts when in power, who ever tries the Administration will mainly consider the quo animo that directed them. It being most essential for an Administration which had come into power against the will of a majority of the People, to convert that majority into a minority, I would examine the means used for this purpose, and their connexion with those transactions by which the great principle upon which our Government is founded, was rendered utterly nugatory. Shall an Administration, thus possessed of power, be permitted, through their friends in this House, to put themselves on trial for measures that they are not responsible for, and which, whether found right or wrong, would necessarily produce an acquittal? No, sir, that cannot be; nor will they get their trial upon any particular measure. If a man should break into my house, will I stop to make terms with him, and yield the possession upon the condition that he will behave himself civilly while there? No, sir; but that is for the People to decide, not this body. If, however, we must be forced into the discussion of these measures, I would look mainly at those which have grown out of the circumstances of the election, and, as I have said before, at the quo animo that controlled them. If called upon to investigate the case of the outfit to John A. King, I would look beyond the act to the motive which may have led to it, and whether it was not a part of that system which has rendered it necessary to dispense patronage without regard to the public service, for the purpose of acquiring power to control public opinion at the next election. If we must enter into a discussion for the trial of the Administration, we must present the proper topics for it, and not be drawn aside to examine the amount or date of a salary. If I were about to investigate the character of the Mission to England, I would not merely dwell upon its progress, or consequences, resulting, as it did, in the loss of the Colonial Trade, which, by the bye, was least of all the fault of the Ministry—I would look beyond all these, and enquire whether there were no antecedent arrangements of a peculiar character that controlled the transaction. If I were to refer to the Panama Mission, I would not indulge a feeling in relation to the agents employed in it, but examine it as it was, a piece of splendid State pageantry, got up and prosecuted, regardless of the danger of an entangling political connexion with foreign Governments, with a view not only to extend patronage, but to dazzle the public mind after the manner and for the same purpose, that corruption fetes are given in the old world. If compelled to pursue this subject further, I would analyze the idea contained in a remark which I have heard attributed to a high public functionary. When it was asked of him, as he was about to seize the boon he had sought, how a minority could be changed into a majority? he observed, "give us the patronage, and we will make ourselves popular." This expression speaks volumes: it admonishes us where to look for the transactions upon which to try this Administration, and presents a clear view of the policy that has sought, with so much solicitude and zeal, to form a coalition of the State Administrations with that of this Government. It would explain the various movements intended to combine their power and patronage with that of the General Government, against the popular will. If this purpose could have been accomplished, we should have seen a Holy Alliance of power, similar, in principle, to that of Continental Europe, united to resist the influence of public virtue and popular intelligence. Do we not know that the expenditures of this Government, exclusive of the Sinking Fund, amounts to about twelve millions annually? What those of the State Governments are, I do not so well know. Whatever the latter may be, if they had been united, they would have controlled the event of this great contest, against all human power; thanks, however, to the intelligence and virtue of the American People, this could not be done.

These are a few of the topics which will enter into the discussion on this great trial. But it would not stop here. We should have to go farther, and follow down into the minute ramifications of the same system which uses the patronage, not for the public good, but to convert a minority into a majority. It would, in that case, be necessary to observe the measures taken to get a control over the press, by means of the public money. So much has been said, both here and abroad, on this subject, that I will only glance at it. We have seen presses having a large subscription list, which had been employed, in better times, to promulgate the acts of the Government, indirectly publishing a paragraph of eulogy in favor of one of the greatest public benefactors of our country now living, and the returning mail, almost literally, as I say, the returning mail carrying the punishment for so gross an indignity to the system upon which the Administration rests its hope. We might trace this operation even more minutely, and find a Head of a Department, of high responsibility, descending to take a scanty pittance, not from a political adversary, but from a poor widow and her orphan children, to reward one of the most venal wretches, for the most venal services that such a man could render. You might follow up still further, and find the same venal wretch convicted of publishing a forgery so gross, that it was denounced, along with some of his other calumnies, by every honorable Editor on the same side of the political question. And, afterwards, we may see a special mandate from one of the Departments of the Government, directing the advertisements for its supplies, &c. to be given him, as a reward for such service. But enough of this. Every man who loves his country must feel ashamed and degraded, when contemplating such transactions as these, emanating from the grand councils of this nation.

We have heard, in the course of this debate, of recommendations made by the President in favor of economy. We all know that recommendation and practice are two things, as different as precept and example often are. These recommendations were most appropriately styled, the other day, "lofty generalities," and more especially when we look into the other matters recommended in the same message, it would not be very unreasonable to regard them as entitled to about as much notice as "your humble servant" at the bottom of a letter. Not finding, however, a coincidence of recommendation and practice, inasmuch as no subject is proposed upon which to practice the economy recommended, it might, not unfairly be supposed, that the whole may have been intended for political effect. I do not say so, but I think the inference is not unfair, more especially when I find a sentiment of a very opposite character contained in a letter written by the same distinguished individual, which, not having been intended for publication, most likely expressed the real sentiments of the writer, and I am very sure it was not intended for political effect. This letter was written by Mr. Adams, from Ghent, to Levitt Harris, then at St. Petersburg. He appears to have been giving Mr. Harris an account of the state of things at home during the severest part of the late war. I find in it the following sentence: "Divided among ourselves, more in passions than interest, with half the nation sold by their prejudices and their ignorance to our enemy, with a feeble and penurious Government, with five frigates for a Navy, and scarcely five efficient regiments for an Army, how can it be expected that we should resist the mass of force which that gigantic Power has collected to crush us at a blow?" I have selected this sentence on account of its direct bearing on the point I was considering. It will be recollected that our Government was then struggling with many and serious difficulties; that it was carrying on the war at an enormous expense, in which the least of all faults was penuriousness. The enemy had been, it is true, gallantly beaten and driven back at various points, but the difficulties threatening us were still great. At such a moment, we find a public officer, occupying a high station under the Government in a Foreign country, not sympathizing with us in our difficulties, but anathematizing the Government for its feebleness, penuriousness, and consequent unfitness for the purpose for which it was established. We find, upon looking into the documents of this House, that that letter was written not long after Mr. Adams received notice, from the then Secretary of State, that Congress, practising a little economy, had refused to allow him more than $4,500 outfit, for the Mission in which he was associated to negotiate the peace with Great Britain. Congress, thought an outfit of $4,500, for a Minister already abroad, was equivalent to the allowance of $9,000 made to the other Ministers, who left their home and business, and made a distant journey.

[Here Mr. DORSEY inquired what mission this allowance had been made for.]

Mr. I. said, I will give the gentleman all the particulars, if he desires them. Mr. Adams being resident Minister at St. Petersburg, was associated with Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin to negotiate a peace under the Russian mediation; under this appointment which was made during the recess of Congress, $9,000 were sent to him for an outfit, not out of the fund appropriated to pay Ministers abroad, but another fund, over which the President had then a temporary discretion; when Congress met, the subject was submitted for their decision, and they refused to grant more than $4,500 for that object. This Mission, it should be observed, was subsequently arranged to negotiate at Ghent, I believe, under a new commission; while at that place, Mr. Adams was informed of the decision of Congress upon his outfit, and that he could not be allowed more than $4,500 in the settlement of his account, upon which he wrote a letter, not very respectful, to that penurious Congress, in which he said they might as well confiscate his property as take from him this money. Some time in 1821 or '22, Congress passed a law prohibiting the payment of salaries to public officers who stood indebted to the United States on the books; this made it necessary to settle the account, and the officer of the Treasury, refusing to pass that sum to his credit, it was referred to the President, who referred it to the Attorney General, and he decided that it was a vested right; upon which the account was closed, without any appropriation having ever been made by law to pay that sum. I have already said, that the letter to Mr. Harris was written not long after the receipt of the letter from the State Department, communicating the decision of Congress; and it is not very unreasonable to suppose, that the severe denunciation against the Government, contained in the letter to Harris, was produced by that incident; it goes very far to show, however, the real sentiments of the writer on the subject of economy.

But, to return to the resolution, I repeat my protest against any trial of the Administration upon such questions as it or the amendment embraces. As to retrenchment, I would do all in my power to effect it, but I never will be instrumental in breaking down or impairing any institution of the country which has been found valuable or necessary to the public interest, and whatever may be my opinion of the present Administration, I am not anxious to see those I think better of in possession of the power, as to be willing to injure the fabric of the Government for that object; nor do I believe that purpose would be promoted by such means. One remark as to the wages of members of Congress. I have often observed that, when Congress proposes to make any retrenchment, those who are likely to be affected by it contrive to make it recoil upon you, by getting up a proposition, through some of their friends, to reduce your own wages—they tell us to begin at home, and then go abroad to retrench. From my own experience, I should consider it an act of some temerity to attempt a general reduction of salaries, however necessary it might be whenever you do this, it is like attacking a nest of hornets all are armed with a sting, and in full concert to assail the rash adventurer—the better way would be to take up the subjects of retrenchment one at a time, and dispose of them in detail; you cannot succeed against whole masses of men thus concerted; the undertaking is too great, they will act upon you in a thousand ways; which you cannot meet nor understand. As regards the compensation of Members of Congress, I would have no hesitation in appealing to the good sense of the People—I will never appeal to their passions or selfish feelings, believing that, whoever honestly appeals to their intelligence will always be sustained. He errs very much who supposes that the People do not understand the motives of public men as well as those who are in action. A member of Congress now receives, exclusive of travelling expenses, about as much annually as the petty Inspector of the Customs in a commercial city: and regard it as a mere finesse on the part of those who would defeat the object of this resolution, by any other means than voting against it, to turn us back to our own compensation for a beginning of every proposed retrenchment. All know that it is a very delicate matter to legislate upon this subject. If we propose to increase our pay, we cannot avoid the imputation of selfish motives—if we propose to reduce it, we will be charged with insincerity, and shrinking from the responsibility of voting according to our honest conviction.

I have trespassed too long upon your patience—I have given a faint outline only of a few of the topics which must necessarily be drawn into this discussion. If gentlemen persist in forcing upon us what the gentleman from Indiana has denominated a trial of the Administration, I have no disposition to embark in it. It does not belong to this House. But I can assure gentlemen, that, upon such a trial, the discussion cannot be confined to the points upon which they have chosen to put it. We have been unjustly charged with provoking the discussion. We all know that it is not usual to discuss resolutions of inquiry. They almost always pass as a matter of course. A proposition, very nearly similar, offered by the gentleman from Maryland, not long since, passed in silence, and this ought to have gone through in the same way.

Retrenchment.

but gentlemen have chosen to interrupt the public business, by discussing a proposition for mere inquiry; and the responsibility rests with them. I will only add, that the great political question which they have struggled so hard to draw into this House, is before the People, and as intelligent a People as any on the face of the globe. They are fully competent to understand and decide it. My chief purpose in rising was, to protest against taking this question out of their hands, or entertaining any appeal from such a tribunal, on such a subject, to this House, when it is not forced upon us by the Constitution. I have seen one appeal from the decision of the American People to the House of Representatives, but I hope in God it will be the last.

Mr. VANCE rose, and said, that he had not intended to take any part in the present debate; but he must be permitted to say that, from the commencement of this session, and throughout its course until now, there had been manifested a spirit towards a certain class of individuals, such as never had been exhibited in this Nation, nor, as he believed, in any other. Certain watchwords, and he would add, also, certain countersigns, had taken the rounds in a very significant manner. They had commenced with a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] whom he did not now see in his place, at the time when the resolution respecting the selling out of our stock in the United States' Bank was under discussion; but he believed there were few at that moment who thought them to be so significant as they had since been made. He alluded particularly to a remark, so often made by certain gentlemen, that they had come here to do the public business and to go home. Sir, who has not come here to do the public business? For myself I came here to do the public and the private business which might come before me in this House, together with any other business in which my constituents might wish me to act, and then to go home.

In the course of the remarks which have been made in this debate, it has been alleged that there is a certain party in this House, who believe a public debt to be a public blessing. Sir, I have attended here now for seven sessions, and I never heard that sentiment uttered in this House except by one gentleman, and he is now at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. Sir, I recollect it well. It was on the question of retrenchment, or of the reduction of the army, when that gentleman declared that the public debt belonged to posterity. He was the only individual I ever heard utter such a sentiment; if others had, I have not heard them.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] told his friends that we of the Administration party were a well disciplined phalanx, and that we never acted on any important measure without a consultation first had without the walls of this House. Sir, if there has been any such consultation, I for one never heard of it, nor did I ever hear a single friend of the Administration suggest the necessity or expediency of any such measure. No, sir, not one. If any such consultation has been held the secret was kept from me. What, sir, to charge upon us that we sit still and demure, and make no movements, and leave you to do all the public business; Why, sir, what power have we in this House? None at all. By the very organization and construction of the committees of this House, the Administration party are debarred from all power on this floor. Sir, when those committees were formed, there were personal predilections at stake; and I will say that such a proscription was never witnessed under this or any other Administration. No, sir. No such proscription was ever seen in this country. Sir, what are the facts? When there only exists between the two parties a mere difference of opinion, when neither party claims to be exclusively either the Republican or the Democratic party, but merely because we differ in our judgment as to a certain man whom we think best qualified to rule over the nation, we have been proscribed in the manner I have pointed out. And, sir, this proscription is not merely personal, it is sectional. In the eight committees of this House, which may be justly termed National Committees, and who have all the most important business to perform, I will state how the two parties stand. Maine has two members on committees; one of these of the Administration, and one of the Opposition; and has no Chairman on any one of them. New Hampshire has two members, both in favour of the Administration. Massachusetts has four, all in favour of the Administration. It has a chairman in one of the committees, but the majority of the committee are in the opposition. Rhode Island has no member on either of those committees. Connecticut has none. Vermont has a member, who is a Chairman, in favor of the Administration, but a majority of the committee is in the Opposition.

[Mr. KREMER here inquired of the chair, whether the gentleman from Ohio was in order in thus arraigning the appointment of the committees?]

The SPEAKER replied that he was. He was making statements which the Chair presumed he intended to bring to bear upon the general argument.]

Mr. VANCE replied that he did so intend, and then proceeded with his statement. New Jersey has one member of these committees, and he is for the Administration. New York has six members on these committees, three for the Administration, three in the opposition, and one chairman. Pennsylvania has six members, four in the Opposition and two for the Administration. Delaware has none. Maryland has three, all for the Administration. Virginia has two chairmen of these committees and six members, all in the Opposition.

Mr. M'DUFFIE here rose to order. He said he was aware of all the delicacy of that situation in which the Speaker was placed, and he wished to ask whether it would be in order to appeal from the decision just now given in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. I wish that the House should take upon itself the responsibility of determining whether this debate shall go on or not.

The SPEAKER said, that he should not pronounce the gentleman from Ohio out of order. His remarks, so far, in relation to the political and geographical organization of some of the Standing Committees of the House, were of too general a character to justify the Chair in pronouncing them out of order. Whatever the motives of the gentleman from Ohio might be, it was not for the Speaker to decide; nor could he anticipate the particular application which that gentleman intended to give to his argument. The Chair, therefore, under the circumstances of the case, decided that the gentleman from Ohio, was not out of order, and might proceed.

Mr. M'DUFFIE appealed from this decision to the House, and said, he would state the ground of his appeal. The proposition before the House, [said Mr. M'D.] involves simply an inquiry into the expediency of retrenchment in the expenditure of the public money. No remarks of any member of the House, so far as I recollect, has had reference to any other subject but this. The member from Ohio, now goes into an inquiry relative to the organization of the Committees of this House, and to the manner in which the duties of the Chair have been discharged. Now, I submit to the House whether it would not be as much in order to go into an examination of a project of a gentleman from his own State, to get into a hole at the North Pole. It has no manner of connexion with the subject before the House, and I trust the House will decide whether we are to be disgraced in the public estimation by proceeding in a discussion which now assumes a character, that cannot but degrade this body before the nation.

H. OF R.]

Retrenchment.

[JAN. 29, 1828.]

The SPEAKER now stated the question upon the appeal, in the usual form, viz. "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. CHILTON now said, that it might be incumbent upon him to speak for a moment to the question of order. He really begged leave of the House to make a few remarks. He would state as an additional reason why he supposed the decision of the Chair ought to be reversed, that the proposition now in discussion, was not embraced in the resolutions. He considered himself as capable to decide on this question as any other member could be, since he had himself given origin to the resolutions. I would not have remarks put into my mouth, which I never contemplated. As the character of the Administration is not included in my resolutions, it is not in order to discuss it.

Mr. CARTER said, that it could not have escaped the observation of the House, that the object of this rehearsal, on the part of the gentleman from Ohio, was not merely to impugn the impartiality of the Chair, but to sustain the charge of proscription which he had advanced, and to show that the presiding Officer of this House had so far forgotten his duty, as to organize the Committees with a view to embarrass the Government.

The CHAIR here interposed, and reminded the gentleman that an appeal was not debatable.

The question then being about to be put—

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, demanded that it should be taken by yeas and nays.

It was so ordered by the House—yeas 40, noes 120—(one-fifth being sufficient to order the yeas and nays.)

Upon which, Mr. BARTLETT moved an adjournment.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1828.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. CHILTON's resolutions, with the amendments proposed there-to.

The question on the appeal of Mr. McDUFFIE was propounded from the Chair, when the House affirmed the decision of the Speaker, yeas 91, nays 62—and Mr. VANCE again took the floor. On resuming his remarks—

Mr. VANCE said, in justice to myself, to you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, I trust I shall be permitted to say that my motives in bringing the organization of the committees before this House, have been totally misconceived. I am the last man on this floor that would unnecessarily bring this or any other matter before this House, calculated to wound the feelings of its presiding officer, and towards you, sir, personally, no such feeling exists. In doing what I have done, and was continuing to do, when called to order by the member from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE] I was doing nothing more than stating a historical fact—the organization of the House—which fact was necessary to meet and repel the arguments of the member from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] which could be met in no other way. In speaking of the friends of the Administration, the member from Virginia says, "I see one of these parties, perfectly willing, no doubt, with the very great man to whom I have before alluded, to throw upon us the responsibility for whatever is done here: sitting perfectly still, steadfast, silent, and demure, bringing forward no proposition whatever. I see the other party throwing out proposition after proposition. The opposite party never commits itself until after a night's reflection. And what is the consequence? Though I believe a minority, they so manage matters as to constitute an effective majority of this House; and then throw on us the responsibility of their own measures. Sir, this is a new sort of political justice."

This is the language of the member from Virginia, which it is my purpose to meet and repel. What, Sir, we embarrassing legislation on this floor by consultation! If so, we deserve the proscription and denunciation of all honest men, of all parties: for I have no hesitation in saying, that whenever the legislation of this House is decided by caucusses and consultations, secret or open, the days of the Republic will be numbered; and whenever I am convinced that a party is acting in this manner, it shall cease to be my party; I would not only desert it, but I would despise myself if I did not denounce and expose it. Sir, if I could have believed, for a moment, that an expose of the organization of the Committees would have produced so much sensibility, I would not have arrayed them before this House and nation. I will not say, Sir, if I filled the place that you do, and under the circumstances in which you are placed, with all the passion and prejudice growing out of a desperate political conflict, that I would not have done as you have thought it your duty to do. No, Sir; it is not what you have done, that I am complaining of; but it is that we of the Administration party should be divested of political power, and then charged with neglect of duty for not exercising it.

One word, Sir, as it regards the member from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. It may be considered by some that I take exceptions to his appointment. Not so. In his legislative character he has always shewn himself above party. And although he is the only man upon earth, with whom I am acquainted, between whom and myself there is an entire separation, yet, with all the political passion existing between us, I have always done justice to his talents and integrity as a legislator, and will say here, what I have said elsewhere, that I would have no objections to his filling the place he now does under any Administration. No, Sir; it is a rule of my life to do justice, regardless of passion or party, to my political adversaries. I never heard a foul calumny charged upon a political opponent, knowing it to be such, but what I met and repelled it with indignation, and the world that knows me, knows that this is my practice. And, Sir, I observe the same course in defence of a friend. And when I cease to have these feelings, or to act upon these principles, in my opinion, I shall no longer be worthy of a seat on this floor. Unhappily I have come in collision, politically, with many men, but I have never written any thing about any man, but what I am willing should be put forth to the world in the broad face of day. No dark and mysterious letters and essays have ever been produced by my pen. What I have to say of men politically, I say it here on this floor, where I am liable to be met face to face. I have strong passions to combat; they have been aggravated by persecution and abuse. And I confess I was forcibly struck some days since, at the sensibility of the member from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] on a charge of insincerity, in the National Journal, relative to the debate on the sale of the Government Stock in the Bank of the United States. His sensibility did credit to his feelings. Of the injustice of the charge, I do not doubt; but, before the depreciation of this member, relative to the Government paper making this charge against him, had ceased to sound in my ear—indeed, I believe the very next morning—I found myself together with the Ohio Delegation, denounced as traitors, for preferring one individual to another as the Chief Magistrate of this nation. Yes, Sir; here was a Government paper, edited by an officer of this Congress, the printer of the Senate, goading men to desperation, and exulting and glorying in his success.

[Here the CHAIR reminded the gentlemen that it was not in order to notice the debates and proceedings of the Senate.]

Mr. V. said, he had no disposition to transgress the rules of this House; that he had not referred to the other branch of the Legislature, but to an officer of that branch.

Before I proceed, I wish to say one word to the member from South Carolina, [Mr. CARTER] whose friendship it has been my good fortune to enjoy from our first acquaintance until the present time. In his remarks, on yesterday, he appears to have taken up the idea that my intention was to make an attack on the Speaker. From what I have said to-day, I hope he is convinced of his misapprehension. The sectional organization to which I referred, was, I confess, principally directed to the Judiciary Committee. The People of the Western States feel a lively interest in having the Judicial System beneficially extended to the Western States. The President recommends it in his message to Congress. A bill passed this House at the first session of the last Congress, that would have been satisfactory, but for some cause to me unknown, it was so amended in the Senate, that its friends were compelled to vote against it. We are to this period of the Session without a report. It is plainly to be seen that our grievances are not to be remedied, but they are to be continued another and another year. I take no exceptions to the men that compose the Committee; indeed, the member at the head of it is as conscientious and honest a legislator, in my humble opinion, as there is on this floor or in this nation. But I speak of facts, and them I have a right to speak of. And one fact is, that five out of seven of the present Judges of the Supreme Court are from the Southern or the slave-holding States; and another is, that five out of seven of the Committee are from the same States; and another fact is, that, if the bill, as amended by the Senate in the last Congress, shall be reported and passed, eight out of ten of these Judges may, and probably will, be from those States.

[Here the SPEAKER called to order.]

Mr. V. said, he would always cheerfully submit to the decision of the Chair. He spoke of facts, he intended to speak freely, but not disrespectfully; he knew his own feelings and his liability to err, but no man, on being convinced of error, would with more cheerfulness and promptness do justice to others. He said, he would now proceed to complete what he was at when called to order on yesterday. If he recollected right, he was at the State of Virginia. That State has two Chairmen, six members, all in the Opposition. North Carolina has no member on either of these Committees. South Carolina has two Chairmen, six members, all in the Opposition; Georgia has two members, both in the Opposition; Tennessee has one chairman, four members, all in the Opposition; Kentucky has two members, both in the Opposition; Ohio has four members, one in the Opposition, and three for the Administration; Louisiana has three members, one in the Opposition, and two for the Administration; Illinois has one member in the Opposition; Indiana has one member; Mississippi has one member in the Opposition; Alabama has one member in the Opposition; Missouri has no member on either of these committees. On these committees, there are fifty six members—thirty four in the Opposition, and twenty-two for the Administration; and, with this strong organization against us, we are chided by the member from Virginia with sitting demurely and silently, taking no part in legislation, making no proposition, but pouncing upon theirs—relieving ourselves of responsibility, and ungenerously throwing it upon our adversaries. Sir, this is not a matter of our seeking; and if gentlemen find themselves unequal to the task they have undertaken, do not let them blame us with their misfortunes.

The member from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] asks who it was, in the other branch of the National Legislature, that voted against extending our laws and giving protection to the citizens of Louisiana. This allusion, sir, is directed against the President of the United States, who, it appears, had, at that time, the same constitutional scruples relative to this business, that were entertained by Jefferson, and many others of the most worthy men of this nation. But, at the same time that he gave this vote he was as much in favor of the acquisition of Louisiana as any man then in the Senate, as his official acts will abundantly show. But when, let me ask, did the member from Virginia fall so much in love with the People of the Western States? And more particularly let me ask, what burst of light has drawn forth all these affectionate regards in favor of the Louisianians? Is it since the year 1822, when he said the framers of the Constitution mistook the policy of this country [by admitting the Western States into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States? When he said we of the West might do to rule People under the Rocky Mountains, but we should not rule him? In 1822 we were not, in the member's opinion, entitled, or, at least, ought not to be, to equal privileges on this floor; but in 1828 he becomes so extremely fond of us, that an unimportant conscientious vote of the present President of the United States, is viewed by him with indignation, yea, feeling indignation, and the whole sympathy of his nature is awakened and alive to our interest, prosperity, and happiness.

But, lest I should be misunderstood, permit me to read an extract from the member's speech, made in the debate on the apportionment bill, February the 6th, 1822.

"Mr. RANDOLPH said, he would again call the attention of the elder brethren of the Confederacy—the political Esau of our tribe—to the predicament in which they stand. We have heard a great deal of the wisdom of the men who framed the Constitution under which we now sit. I have much faith in their wisdom, an unshaken and unchangeable faith in their virtue; but I will believe experience against the word of Solomon himself. I then say, that, in my feeble apprehension, they committed an error, fundamental and fatal, as practised upon since by their successors—they made a provision for the admission of new States into the Union."

Yes sir, in the year 1822, it was an error, fundamental and fatal, in the opinion of that gentleman, for the People of the West to have the same weight in the councils of the Nation that was enjoyed by the elder Esau of the tribe. And, sir, who is it that held this language relative to the Western People? Who is it that manifested this feeling of proscription towards us and our posterity? Sir, it is the man who is now at the head of the Opposition to this Administration; it is the man who was placed, by you, sir, at the head of the principal committee of this House. Yes, sir, he was placed there by aid of the vote of the very People that he has derided and abused, and, if ill health had not prevented, would have been in that exalted station. It is the man that is entitled to more credit, if it is right that this Administration should go down, for his efficiency in effecting that object, than any three men in this nation. This is not a hasty opinion of mine; it is one long held, and often expressed. I have been an attentive observer of his course ever since the first organization of the party to which he belongs. From the moment he took his seat in the other branch of the Legislature, he became the great rallying officer of the South. Our Southern brethren were made to believe that we of the North were political fiends, ready to oppress them with heavy and onerous duties, and even willing to destroy that property they held most sacred. Sir, these are not exaggerated statements relative to the course of this distinguished individual. He is certainly the ablest political recruiting sergeant that has been in this or any other nation—

[Here the Chair interposed. It was not in order to use terms of reproach, or speak disrespectfully of any member of the House.]

Mr. V. said he had no such intention, but was only using as strong terms as he could to describe the powers of the individual as an able and efficient rallying political partisan. I disclaim any thing else, and will cheerfully take back any offensive words that I may have used in the heat of debate. My object is to state truths, yes, great truths; and God forbid that I should, here or elsewhere, manifest any feelings towards any man, but those of honor and propriety. I will then proceed: this same member, and in the same debate from which I have already read an extract, in speaking of Ohio, and its admission into the Union—and this I wish the members from Ohio, particularly those of the opposition, to pay some attention to—used the following terms:

"A vast augmentation of weight, in this House and elsewhere, was now to be given to some of the States—and of all the States in the Union to the State of Ohio—which State—but not by his vote, he believed he stood alone on that occasion—he would not dress himself in borrowed plumes, he would claim no credit for others' liberality. The subject had been referred to a committee, of which he [Mr. Randolph] was chairman. For some cause, not necessary to state, it was afterwards put into other hands: in fact, to two individuals, was entrusted the marking out the boundaries of that State, out of which arose the existing dispute between her and Michigan. They had a carte blanche, and they won the game accordingly. That great State, one of the greatest intriguers who ever wormed himself into any Department of this Government, said, he was laying off for the purpose of clipping the wings of Virginia. Little did I then dream that I should ever politically live to witness the fulfilment of this prediction, although I foresaw it must come, and took my measures accordingly."

It will be perceived by this extract, that the member from Virginia, in this debate, prided himself in voting against the admission of Ohio—indeed, he has heretofore prided himself, I believe, in voting against every new State that has been admitted into this Union. Here let me ask, with what propriety he can now come forth and can chide the chief Magistrate of this nation, because he thought it unconstitutional to tax and extend the laws over the citizens of Louisiana—opinions at that day held by Thomas Jefferson, the pride of Virginia and the nation? But I will read an extract taken from the same debate, before alluded to, and then let the House judge which of the two, the member from Virginia or the President, has held the strongest language on the subject of the acquisition of Louisiana. In speaking of that State in the debate on the apportionment bill, in 1822, the gentleman from Virginia said—

"We were then called on, Mr. R. continued, by some of the very men who had a hand in framing the Constitution, and whose wisdom has been so loudly and not unjustly applauded, to pause before we signed that treaty admitting vast regions of country into the Confederation. We were forewarned, but not forearmed, said he, as is proved by what we are now experiencing, and what we are now beginning to experience. I repeat—for we are yet in the green tree—and when the time comes when the whole country is filled up, if these things are now done in the green tree, what then will be done in the dry? I, for one, although forewarned, was not forearmed. If I had been, I have no hesitation in declaring, that I would have said to the imperial Dejanira of modern times, take back your fatal present. I would have staked the free navigation of the Mississippi on the sword, and we must have gained it."

These, sir, were in 1822, the feelings of the member from Virginia towards Louisiana. His modern conversion every man in this House and in this nation will not be at a loss to comprehend and appreciate.

I have another document, of more authenticity, as it is sanctioned by the name of the member from Virginia. It is a letter dated the 17th of May, 1824, dated from the ship Nestor, at sea. It will be recollected that this letter made some stir once on this floor. It was written in favor of Mr. Crawford—to this I have no objections—my objections to this letter are of another character. I repel the assertion, that the Western People, as a People, ever had any feelings towards that distinguished individual, than those of respect and gratitude. And, sir, was it just in the member from Virginia to proclaim to the world that we were his accusers and persecutors; that we, like the hounds of Acton, had assailed him by whom we had been cherished and fed. Sir, it is injustice to the Western People, to attribute to them any such feeling, but, lest I should be misunderstood, I will read an extract from the letter itself. Here Mr. V. read the extract.

"And it is a matter worthy of notice, that the very People, at whose prayers and entreaties, and to save whom from utter ruin he has pursued a certain line of conduct, have been his most virulent accusers and persecutors for that very conduct, which has contributed at once to their relief, and at the same time been servicable to the Government, by rescuing a large debt from the almost total loss which would have followed a rigid exercise of his authority. He has availed himself of discretionary powers, reposed in him by the law, for that purpose, and with that intent, to mitigate the severity of the sufferings of our Western fellow citizens, whose clamors, had he taken a different course, would have dissolved the present feeble and distracted Administration of our Government, and Acton like, he is assailed by the very hounds that he has cherished and fed."

Now, Sir, as it regards the individual to which this letter alludes, I can say for myself, that in the course of my life, I have never written but two or three political essays, and they were in his favor, and that at a time when he was not my choice for the office of Chief Magistrate; but I threw in my feeble mite to try to arrest the current of calumny and detraction that was bearing down upon this persecuted man, in successive torrents, that at last overwhelmed him. It is true that, from the succession of attacks, and the boldness with which they were published to the world, many good and honest men in the West did believe that he had almost exhausted the Treasury to get into power. But, Sir, under all this calumny and detraction, he still retained many enlightened and firm friends, who never for a moment believed him guilty of the smallest dereliction of public duty. I thank God that the public moral, and feeling of the country is restored in favor of this once injured and persecuted individual. Let it not be said of the West, as a People, that they are chargeable with the persecution of Mr. Crawford. They are the last People on earth liable to such a charge. Yes, his celebrated report, in favor of the Western land debtors, will be remembered with gratitude, and the memory of its author will be cherished by generations to come as a noble act of a disinterested and generous man, laboring to rescue their fathers from a debt that they were totally unable to pay. Sir, I never think of the fate of that man, but I am chilled to the bone. By calumny and detraction, he was not only politically, but physically, and mentally destroyed. The noblest and best feelings of our nature, possessed in such an eminent degree by that high-minded and honorable man, were laid under contribution by his defamers and abusers, and made the dagger that pierced him to the heart. I was going to say more on this subject, but I forbear; I have no disposition to harrow up feelings and recollections that ought to be buried—no; forbearance is a noble quality, and I obey her dictates.

There is another individual, whose character has not been permitted to escape in this debate; and who has been held up to the American People, not only here, but elsewhere, as one whose principles were to be avoided and detested—I mean the elder Adams. Sir, that distinguished patriot committed errors in his political course through life, there can be no doubt—many of his political doctrines were not my doctrines; but, from the justice that has been done to him by all parties throughout the United States, since he has been gathered to his fathers, I had supposed he might have been suffered to sleep in peace with his compatriots and compeers, Washington and Jefferson. Mr. V. said, pointing to the Declaration of Independence, the hallowed corps that there surround him, and the distinguished stand that he there occupies, ought to shield him from abuse and detraction. I envy no man his feelings who has the heart to assault the humblest individual amongst that group of worthies; and, assault them as we may, for effect, or not, they will still live fresh in the hearts of their countrymen. Yes, John Adams will be pointed out by living fathers, and living mothers, to their children, in generations yet unborn, as the friend of Washington, the companion of Jefferson, through life and in death, and the ablest and most efficient defender of our National Independence—when his defamers and abusers shall be swallowed up in forgetfulness. Sir, I am aware that I am wandering. It is not my wish so to do, but to answer the arguments and repel the assaults of those that have preceded me. The member from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] talked very pathetically about the poor man; his pound of sugar, peck of salt, &c. Now, Sir, I would be glad to know when all those feelings came athwart the member? Are they since the Huskisson dinner at Liverpool? They do not comport with what the member is reported to have said after the excursion in the Dublin steam packets. Mr. V. said he would read for the information of the House, the member's sentiments at that time.

[The CHAIR said it was out of order, and again admonished the gentleman from Ohio, that personal allusions could not be admitted.]

Mr. V. said, he had no wish to read any thing that was out of order: but, after the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGHAM] had, on yesterday, read the letter of Levitt Harris, going to impeach the character and motives of the President, he thought it would be admissible for him to read the paper referred to; but, as he had no disposition to do or read any thing contrary to rule, he would submit to the decision of the Chair, and speak of the fact from memory alone. The member from Virginia, at the time and place to which I had last alluded urged the People to keep down the dregs of society. Verily, John Bull must have stood perfectly astounded, to hear a Virginia democrat haranguing the nobility of England, to oppress and keep under the lower orders of society. Yes, give them another wrench of the screw, or they will not only prove blue but black ruin. Sir, these were the feelings of the member in 1826, but they have materially changed in 1828.

The member from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] has informed us that he has witnessed the progress of salaries under this Government, and has referred particularly to that of the Attorney General, which at the time of his entering into public life, was only $1200. Now, sir, for the benefit of the member, as well as the House, I will inform him how it came to be increased, as well as almost all the other salaries of the officers of the different Departments. If the member will examine the files of the Intelligencer, of the 18th November, 1803, he will find that it was himself that made the motion to have it increased to $3,000, together with many other motions for the increase of salaries generally throughout the different Departments.

A few more words, Mr. Speaker, and I am done with this subject. I will now, as I always have done, vote for any inquiry relative to the correction of abuses, or the economy of expenditure. I am not particular whether the amendment or the resolution as proposed by the mover, shall succeed. I will cheerfully vote for either; and I trust that either will be found to answer the ends of correction, if indeed correction is needed; and if not, I hope those that have thought otherwise heretofore, will come forth and declare to the world, that the disbursement of the public money has been faithfully made. The member from Virginia has said that this is not the time. Sir, I hope the house will think otherwise, notwithstanding he has told us that the great matter must first be attended to—that is, they must first get the power, and all their energies must first be directed to that great object. Will the member be so good as to inform us, what great benefits are to result to this nation, when the power shall fall into their hands? Will State rights be again restored, agreeably to the Virginia construction of the constitution? If so, we want to know it. The country have a deep interest in resisting these doctrines that are to follow the halcyon days of the new dynasty—when all may either walk, ride, or drive through the mud up to the hub, shouting buzza in favor of the Southern policy of no Roads, no Canals, no Manufactories; but Cotton and Tobacco, the Richmond party, and General Jackson forever?

Mr. PEARCE regretted that the debate should have taken this course, and also that there should have been any debate upon these resolutions. It appears to me singular said Mr. P. that such a debate should have existed: for the friends of the Administration are in favor of the proposed inquiry, and those who are opposed to the Administration, ought not to be opposed to the inquiry which these resolutions will authorize. But, Sir, although I am in favor of this Administration; and have ever been from the commencement of it, and am well persuaded I shall be to its termination; more especially if those who are now in power shall administer the affairs of this country, as they have administered them since the Administration commenced, let it not be understood, or inferred, that, because I do vote for the resolutions, I am influenced by the same considerations which govern others, who have participated in this debate—their motives are different from mine; and, but for the range of this debate, the House would not have been, at this time, troubled with any remarks from me. Sir, as the friend of this Administration, I wish the conduct of those in power might be closely investigated, and the more extensive the inquiry, the more pleased I shall be. If their conduct will not withstand any investigation that can take place, they are not entitled to the confidence of the People, and ought not to be honored with it. I know they are willing to meet it, are anxious for it, and if it were practicable, would be willing, to speak in borrowed language, that a full and complete history of their whole proceedings should be written in sun-beams, in the heavens, that all the world might read it. Sir, I do not vote for these resolutions because I think there are any good reasons for the adoption of them, or that those who are opposed to us will be silent, if, upon a full investigation, it shall be found that there have been no useless expenditures, and the public interest has in nowise suffered, for the last three years. Those who are disposed to arraign this Administration will clamor, will, if possible, poison the public mind, and prejudice the People, if, upon a fair trial, its measures should be found to have been dictated by the best policy, the men in authority as able as any men who have heretofore filled the places which they now fill, and the men themselves as pure as angels. I have no pledges to redeem; I have been brought here by nobody, and have made no promise at home, that, in the event of my coming, the National debt would be extinguished; and I might further add, that I have not, since I came here, received any instructions relative to the subjects embraced by these resolutions, and shall consequently act according to my own convictions, let the consequences which may follow be what they may. The doctrine which inculcates the necessity of immediate payment of a Nation's debt, is, abstracted from all other considerations, a popular doctrine; but, whether it is now expedient to apply, or a sound policy would require, that any greater portion of the Nation's revenue should be applied to the extinguishment of the public debt, than by law is annually applied, is certainly at least questionable, as the interests and concerns of this nation are such as to make it necessary that a part of its revenue should be applied to other purposes. We learn from high authority, that it is, wrong to leave for posterity those burdens which we ought to bear; yet, at the same time, we know, it would be unwise to take upon ourselves the whole of those burdens, part of which belong to, and ought to be borne by, future generations. The war of the Revolution was not for the three millions of People that were engaged in it, not two of which are now in existence, but the benefits and advantages that were to result from it, were for them and their posterity. As those who were then on the stage were to participate in the benefits of American Independence, as well as succeeding generations, it was wise as well as just, that the debt of the Revolutionary war should have been paid by those who fought, and by all those who were soon to realise the anticipated advantages of the American Revolution; and the consequent policy of our ancestors was to pay, themselves, such a part of this debt as they could conveniently pay, and leave to others who were to share in the benefits, the payment of a part. Hence, we find that some part of that debt is unpaid, and the payment of which is left to those who are now in existence. To further illustrate the view taken, suppose that, at the time of the purchase of Louisiana, instead of the sum paid, it was found expedient to have given one hundred millions of dollars, nay, five hundred millions of dollars—and there are men in this country who are now prepared to say, that it would have been better to have given that sum, than not to have possessed ourselves of that Territory—the payment of this sum of money must inevitably have imposed upon this country a very heavy debt; but for whom would the purchase have been made—for whose use and benefit? Why, sir, for those who were living at the time of the purchase, and for future generations—for all those who should be citizens and inhabitants of these United States, for hundreds, for thousands of years to come. Would it then have been wise or politic to have taxed one generation for the payment of a debt contracted for the use and benefit of so many generations? Suppose the acquisition of this Territory had been the result of a war with France or Spain, or both, and the expense of that war had imposed upon our country a debt, in amount equal to that mentioned, the question would again recur, ought the same to be extinguished by one generation? Let those who think the People of this country or their rulers have no other objects to direct their attention to, but the payment of the Nation's debt, answer these questions. Has the attention of the present Administration, as well as those which preceded it, from 1815 to 1825, been directed to no other object, but the payment of the Nation's debt? Ample provision has been made for this payment, by all these Administrations, and for sustaining the credit of the nation, but all of them have had other objects in view; if they had not, the revenue and resources of the country have been such as to have long ago extinguished the public debt; but the extinguishment must have been made under such circumstances, as to have left the country in a condition truly deplorable. From that time to the present, we have maintained at least the skeleton of an army, large enough, however, in time of peace; part of the revenue of the country has been applied to the cultivation of military science, to provide against future contingencies; part to the support and increase of a navy; part to the erection of fortifications along our coasts; and some part to internal improvement, and commercial facilities. What, sir, is the present debt of this Nation, compared with these great objects? In war, with all the resources of the nation, be they ever so great, can you at once, or in time to meet the exigency of the occasion, organize an army with the skill and military science, discipline and experience, which the present organization of our army will possess in the event of a war; build or purchase such a navy as we shall soon have under the present plan of progressive increase; or can you in a moment line our frontiers with fortifications, or render the cities and towns on our seaboard impregnable? The question of internal improvement, or the policy of the measure, is now settled, never again to be disturbed. And to what better purpose can a part of the revenue of the country be applied, than to harbor improvements, to the making of roads, the constructing of canals, uniting the different interests of the country, furnishing facilities of intercourse to every portion and section of the Union, and establishing a chain of union, which neither party, nor faction, nor intrigue, can sever? What, Sir, is the argument in favor of the payment of the National Debt: we should, say gentlemen, be better prepared for war. But will this be the case, if the resources are drained, and the country stopped in the prosecution of those grand objects, the accomplishment of which is so necessary to prepare us for war? This House has already determined, by a very decided majority, that, popular as the argument is in favor of paying the National Debt, they would not sell the interest of the Government in the United States' Bank, to hasten the extinguishment; nor will they, as I believe, abandon those great objects now commenced, and in favorable progress, in the prosecution and completion of many of which the country has so deep an interest.

The argument, Mr. Speaker, in favor of the payment of our National Debt, has been enforced, or rather an attempt has been made to enforce it, by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CAMERON] by comparing a nation in debt, with an individual, or the head of a family in the same situation. What prudent head of a family would not pay his debts, who consulted his own interest, as soon as his resources would admit of it? In answer to that gentleman, as with an individual, so with a nation, the soundness and correctness of the policy of the one as well as the other, will depend on the circumstances of the case; and if the individual does not pay an exorbitant interest—if his lands are rising in value—if he is in the neighborhood of a good market, where he can turn at all times the product of his soil into money—and, to use a term that will be well understood by most, if not all the members of this House—if betterments are necessary, it may be necessary for him to apply a part of his income to the erection or the making of those betterments, reserving enough to pay the interest of money, and gradually extinguish the principal, than apply the whole of his income to the payment of his debts, more especially when it is not necessary to do this, to sustain his credit; the doing of which would be an abandonment of other interests, as important, and more important, than the payment at once of the whole of his debts. And, in reference to the debt of this Nation, it has been shewn by my friend from Pennsylvania, now near me, [Mr. STEWART] that a part of it is not yet redeemable, and the contingency upon which it was to have been paid, does not yet exist; that the provision now made for the annual extinguishment of both principal and interest, will in a very few years wipe away the whole. I vote not for these resolutions, influenced by the popular argument arising from the payment of the National Debt; ample provision is made for that; and the same is sinking as fast as the Government ought, or can sink it, in justice to other interests.

This is my view of this subject, these are my sentiments—sentiments which I avow here, and will maintain elsewhere. This Administration is not, in my opinion, to be put down by the declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] that the second Adams, if he does not avow the doctrine, is pursuing the policy of the first Adams, that a national debt is a national blessing—an Administration, short as it has been, that has applied thirty three millions to the payment of the national debt, and has extinguished twenty-three millions of the principal. If it were necessary to vindicate the first Adams, I could tell the gentleman from Virginia, that the first Adams never did declare that a national debt was a national blessing. This was the language of a distinguished Federalist in '98—a gentleman from New York, Gouverneur Morris, who was a member of this House at the time the declaration was made; and I do not think it either liberal, or charitable, or just, to make any President answerable for all that may be said, if for any thing, by those who constitute the majority in either House during his Administration. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is not the arguments of gentlemen, grounded, under existing circumstances, upon a more speedy extinguishment of the national debt, which induces me to vote for these resolutions. The arguments drawn from this subject will do better elsewhere than here. They may be powerful weapons under the direction of stump orators, and they are just such arguments as we had a right to expect from those who, in the language of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MITCHELL] had just arrived, "hot from the oven of their constituents."

Mr. Speaker, although I am in favor of retrenchment, if any can be made, without serious injury to the Government, or to those who are concerned in the administration of the affairs of this nation, and will vote for any committee, which can be raised to look into this subject, I will not, in the quoted language of the gentleman from Maryland, "go as far as he who goes farthest." As my friend from Maryland [Mr. BAXTER] is not now in his seat, and as three from that State have addressed the House since these resolutions were submitted for our consideration, permit me, Sir, to say, that I refer to that gentleman who has introduced his horse into this debate, although he has not, like Heliogabalus, conducted him, in propria persona, into this hall. I deal in no such wholesale declarations. I will first enquire how far it may be necessary to go, and will first learn how far he does go who goes farthest, before I shall be prepared to say that I will "go as far as he who goes farthest" in reducing our own compensation, or the pay or emolument of others. I would first enquire how far the compensation of members could be reduced without injury to the Government, or detriment to the People. I will not agree to such a reduction of the pay of members as to leave our seats to be occupied by two classes of our citizens, the most wealthy, and the poorest of our citizens, only one of which could afford to come here—whose reward would be the gratification of their own ambition; and the other would come, having a greater regard to their own promotion or their personal aggrandizement, than the prosperity or happiness of their country. Some gentlemen appear extremely unwilling to say one word about our own compensation, and think it necessary and lawful to reduce the salaries of every officer of the Government; but the moment the compensation of members is referred to, they would have us wrap ourselves up in our own consequence, and, availing ourselves of the powers with which we are clothed, say to the nation and to the world, hands off! We are told by the gentleman from Tennessee, who addressed the House a few days ago, [Mr. MITCHELL] that no man can come to this House without a great sacrifice on his part, and that, since the last adjournment, he has made more money by his profession, than he would realize should he remain a member twenty years. From this declaration, we learn that the gentleman's services are duly appreciated, and his talents properly estimated, at home as well as abroad; and I trust, sir, that the nation will give him credit for his patriotism, his devotion to the best interests of his country, and will one day reward him for the monstrous sacrifice he makes in becoming a member of this House. I envy the gentleman's success and patronage, and perhaps but a very few men could be found, who would be a member of Congress, under such disadvantageous circumstances. But the sacrifice on the part of every member who comes here, is not so great as that gentleman's. Notwithstanding the views of gentlemen, I would extend our inquiries to our own compensation, and to the expenses of this House. Where is the man, who, in this Government, who, in this District, fills a place, and receives a salary, that can save any part of the compensation he receives? Many of those who have fortunes, exhaust them during the time they remain here; and those who have not, leave to their children poverty, as the only legacy they can bequeath them; if they live long enough to educate their children, they have the benefit of that education, if not, they must depend upon charity and friends for a support and education which they cannot derive from any estate of those who have received those salaries at Washington, which it is now proposed to retrench. The men here, sir, appointed to do the business of the Government, are not to be censured because they cannot live upon less; they are not to be blamed for the expenses of the place, and for the high price at which every thing sells; they are here, and are obliged to live as others live. On the score of emolument, there is not a man who holds an office in this City, from the first Secretary to the lowest Messenger, whose situation is an enviable one, or to be coveted. Many of the mechanics of our principal cities receive as much, and live as well, and are sure to leave their families in a better situation. Let, however, the business of retrenchment commence; let gentlemen ferret out the abuses of the Government—perhaps, on inquiry, some may be found; let our inquiries extend to our compensation, and to the expenditures of this House, and if any should be found, they will not be chargeable to this administration. The officers of the Government receive the same compensation under this they received under former administrations; the members of this House receive the same pay they have for years received, and although but a little will be gained by the proposed inquiry, let it take place; neither the administration or its friends have any thing to fear.

In the zeal of gentlemen to retrench, the Military School at West Point has occupied their attention, and violent hands have been laid upon it. I did hope that this institution, which is more creditable to this Government than any other in it, and which, I had supposed, was the favorite child of the nation, would have been spared. I, also, Mr. Speaker, have attended one of the annual examinations of that School, and can, with other gentlemen who have spoken, bear witness to its merits, if its merits are not generally known. Until the commencement of this debate, I had supposed they were. We are told, sir, by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MITCHELL] that it is the nursery of Aristocracy, created for the education of the rich man's son, and a place where the widow's son or the orphan boy cannot enter; or, if he does enter, cannot long remain; established for the education of the sons of members of Congress, and those who are high in office. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that he is mistaken—that he has been misinformed—that, although I shall not question what he has said, in relation to the sons of those coming from his own State, his remarks will not apply to those who have been educated at that School, citizens of the State which I represent. Let the gentleman examine the catalogue of graduates, and he will find that there are men who have had the benefits of this School, and shared in its honors, who were not sons of members of Congress, or those in power. Let the gentleman examine the Army Register, and he will also find that the best and most meritorious of our officers are graduates of this School, who were the sons of widows, or orphan boys, the sons of those who had nothing but poverty to leave to their children for an inheritance, and are indebted to this institution alone for the education which they received. To avoid, if possible, the recital of names, who is the gentleman, who has now the principal superintendence of your fortifications, and who discharges his duties with so much credit to himself and justice to the nation? Who is the aid of your Commander-in-Chief? Who is now the assistant to the Chief Engineer? And I might extend the inquiry to a very great length, of men who are ornaments to their country, and men who, but for this School, would never have received the education and advantages which they derived from it. I once entertained the opinion—an opinion formed without much reflection, that the doors of this institution ought to be opened to the poor only, and the sons of the wealthy should be debarred, and stated my views to the Vice President of the United States, in the first conversation I ever had with that distinguished man, and learnt from him that others had expressed the same opinions; but, said he, to make this a School for the indigent, would render it less valuable to them, as they would not be excited by the same spirit of emulation; that genius was to be found in all grades of society, all classes and ranks of men; and it was the object of the Government of the United States to enlist into its service the best talents, whether found among the rich or the poor. Further reflection has satisfied me that the views of the late Secretary of War were correct. Genius is not confined to any grade of life; it is found among children of the asylum, and is not a stranger to the princely palace. At this institution, a soldier's son—yes, sir, the son of a Sergeant in the Army of the United States, receives the first honors, while the sons of two gentlemen, who have been Speakers of this House, are unable to pass through the ordeal of an annual examination. If, sir, favoritism exists in other institutions, it has no abiding place in this: for, here they all rise or fall by their merits or demerits, and there are none who are the sons of the poor, and none who are the sons of the rich; for no such distinctions are kept up by the officers of that institution. The students themselves soon find of how little use they are. Sir, if I had a son old enough to be admitted into that Academy; if I had any influence with those in power—I know I have none—if my friends had any, it should be exerted and called into operation, if necessary, to procure for that son an admittance; this I would do without property. If, on the other hand, I had the wealth of my friend from New York, [Mr. VAN RENSSELAER] (and I may be permitted to call him so, whose philanthropic spirit makes him the friend of mankind) the most wealthy man in this House, if not in this nation, I would not, like that gentleman, send my son to a private School, where the same sciences are taught; but, if influence were necessary, I would resort to it, to procure for him a place at this School. What greater benefit could you confer upon the son of the rich, as well as poor, than by teaching both that, in this country, the road to preferment is open to both, and the highest honors are within the reach of both—that poverty is no embarrassment, and wealth furnishes no facilities? What better practical lessons, what more useful, or which are better tests of the excellence of our form of Government, and the blessings which our free institutions confer, than those which are taught at this institution? What better plan to fire the ambition of the poor, and excite the emulation of the rich, than the system in force at this School, where the Senator's son and the widow's son are placed upon an equality, and both are told that, in this country, that, at that School, the "mind is the measure of the man?" So long as that useful and distinguished officer, now the superintendent of this institution—an officer whose talents and acquirements are such as to qualify him to discharge the duties of any post or office in this Government, or recognized by our laws, and who has peculiar qualifications for the office, the duties of which he now discharges in a manner as creditable to himself as satisfactory to the nation—shall preside over this institution, so long will the great advantages which the nation has derived from it be dispensed, and so long will the nation continue to realize them. In justice, Mr. Speaker, to the head of the War Department, and that responsibility may rest where it belongs, I hope to be indulged with a few words as to the mode in which appointments are made. There is allotted to each State as many Cadets as there are Representatives and Senators; and, in those States which elect by districts, one to each Congressional district. In making the selection, it is reasonable to suppose that recommendations of members have, with the Secretary of War, great weight. Then, sir, suppose that those abuses, referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MITCHELL] have existed—let it not be understood that I make any admissions—who is, or ought to be, responsible for these abuses? And on whom should the censure fall? Not upon the President or his Secretary, but upon the members. In justice to the useful, as well as distinguished officer now at the head of the War Department, I will further state, what I know to be true, when every thing else is equal, it has been his uniform practice to give the preference, in the selection to be made, to the son of him who is poor. Having met some of the objections to this institution, and, in fact, all that I have distinctly heard, and shown that it is not such an institution as it has been represented to be; that neither this Government nor administration ought to be censured for its fostering care towards it; that the present administration has pursued the same course towards it that others have done; that the expenditures are the same—for I did understand the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CANAN] to withdraw the objection he made on account of the fifteen thousand dollars paid the supernumerary lieutenants, or to admit that, under former administrations, similar appropriations were made, and the same amount paid—it becomes necessary to inquire, what was the object of the Government of the United States in the establishment of this institution? What are the benefits which are derived from it? And whether the objects contemplated have been, or will be, attained? It has been stated, and truly stated, by those who have preceded me in this debate, that this institution was projected by Washington, and founded by Jefferson. I would add, that it began to flourish under the auspices of John C. Calhoun, to whom it seems to have been as dear as the apple of the eye, who was devoted to it, and, on all occasions, evinced his devotion. The moment we declare, by any vote or act of ours, that this institution is an useless one; that it is liable to those imputations which have been cast upon it, that moment, sir, your Vice President, if not shorn of all his beams, is deprived of half his glory. Look into the correspondence between Washington and the Continental Congress, and you will find him continually urging upon that body, pressing upon them, the necessity which existed for the employment of skilful engineers. They were not to be found in the country, for there were no military schools; recourse was had, and necessarily, to foreign countries, as has since been had, for that military skill which was not to be found at home; and military science was then, as it has since been, imported, but not then, nor since, so as to answer all the requisitions of the Government; and, knowing the necessity for such schools, its establishment was among the first recommendations of the first President of these United States. The fortifications which were commenced in '98—some of which were finished, most, if not all, have since been found useless, if not worse than useless: for their erection has been the cause of trouble, as well as expense, in pulling them down—show the necessity of such a school. Many of the disasters which, during the late war, attended the American army, show the want of such a school: for, at that period, the graduates were few, and not one-tenth part of the number required could be found. I might add, for I think I should be warranted in the declaration, that, to the military skill which was drawn from this school, are we mainly indebted for many, if not all the brilliant victories of our army, achieved during that war. Perhaps, sir, the commander in chief would acknowledge, that, for whatever share of honor or glory that was acquired in the battles of Chippewa, and of Bridgewater, in the defence of Fort Erie, and in the memorable sortie from that fort, the army was greatly indebted to the sons of West Point. The monument by him erected at that Point, to the memory of the gallant and lamented Wood who fell in that sortie, is the best evidence of his estimation of the efficient service of those sons, and their country's obligation. Sir, the frequent calls that have been recently made upon Congress for an increase of the corps of topographical engineers, might be referred to as further evidence of the utility of this school, and of the advantages which it will confer on the nation in time of peace, as well as war. The young men who receive the honors of that institution, do not, from necessity, join the army; it is optional with them to do it or not: there are many of them who do not, but return to their friends, and engage in civil pursuits. Are there no benefits to be derived from the education of these men at this school? Yes, sir, their knowledge will not be as water spilt upon the ground, but, even in the ranks of our militia, and at the heads of our militia companies, it will show itself, and the whole militia of the country will share in its benefits; thus, if not making regular soldiers of our militia, extending to them a knowledge of the art of war and a knowledge which, without the aid of this school, could not be well acquired in time of peace. Not to extend my remarks in relation to this institution farther, but in a few words to present to the House its advantages, and the arguments in favor of continuing the patronage it has ever received—if, in peace, it is good policy to prepare for war, we must still continue our patronage. If the internal improvements, long since commenced, are to be further prosecuted, we must continue our patronage; if the system of fortifications commenced, and now in a progressive state, are to be completed, this institution must receive, and continue to receive the patronage of the Government. If it be correct to discipline, and make more efficient the Militia of the States, this institution must be maintained. And, Sir, if vandalism should ever commence its inroads upon this land, destroying whatever is valuable in the institutions of this country, created by a salutary and liberal policy, I pray God, that this institution will be the last spared monument, and will remain until long after others have felt its contaminating touch, unaltered from the imposition of its withering hands.

Now, Sir, what are the other subjects of retrenchment which the zeal of gentlemen to do the republic some service, as well as their patriotism, have directed our attention to? Why, Sir, there are too many Auditors, one at least of them can be spared. The 5th, we are told by one gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILLOW] must now be an useless officer, and that office ought to be abolished; but in this attack, the gentleman from Kentucky is met by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who tells him that this officer is the most important officer of the whole of them, and enumerates the duties of the incumbent; the next day, another gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DANIEL] in his place, tells the House, that, upon the whole, it is best to spare the 5th Auditor, but, as to the 4th, he must surely die. Why this shift, and sudden change? Is the 5th less obnoxious to gentlemen than the 4th Auditor; if so, why! And do gentlemen know any thing about the duties of either of these officers, and whether they are not as numerous and as onerous now, as they heretofore have been? I once held an office under this Government, held it until I came here; the duties of which made me acquainted with some of the duties of the 5th Auditor, and, so far from his having nothing to do, the wonder was, that he should be able to discharge one half of the duties which the office has devolved upon him. What, sir, are the duties of that officer? He is the Agent of the Treasury, and Agent of all the suits brought by the United States, against hundreds, nay thousands of individuals, almost every year; these he has to superintend. With every clerk, every marshal, every attorney, of the United States, in the twenty-four States, and their Territories, he is in constant correspondence, from each of whom he receives at least six reports a year, from some of them more than that number; he has charge of the whole light-house establishment, those built, as well as those ordered every year to be built; he superintends a great share of the moneys disbursed to the civil officers of this Government, as well as the settlement of their accounts. I have not now, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, referred to one half of the duties of the 5th Auditor—on a former occasion, and it was when the bill was under consideration for an increase of the Postmaster General's compensation, I stated to the House, that I thought the duties of this officer were such as to authorize us to increase his salary. I think so now, and would vote for a bill reported for that purpose, with as much cheerfulness as for any bill that could be reported to this House. With the duties of the 4th Auditor I am not so well acquainted, but have understood that he has to settle the accounts of all the officers of the Navy, and that is but a small part of his duties. Neither of these offices were created by the present Administration, nor by any law passed since the commencement of this Administration, nor were the salaries of the incumbents fixed by any law passed since—let gentlemen inquire, before the attention of the House is directed to these officers, whether the same causes do not now exist for their continuance, which existed at the time they were created. But, as another ground of complaint, and I suppose as a charge against this Administration, we are told by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DANIEL] the clerks in the Departments do not, like the laborers in that State, work from sun to sun; and he has once been at one of the offices, and did not find the clerk with whom he had business at his desk. Sir, they do not work from sun to sun, like the laborer in the field, nor do they so work any where else. Are there not Banks in Kentucky, and do the cashiers and their clerks, like laborers in the field, work from sun to sun? Do the clerks in the State or Treasury Departments in that State work from sun to sun? These men, like other men of sedentary habits, must have a little time to eat, a little time to sleep, a little time for recreation or exercise—without which such men could not live. The gentleman from Kentucky has been more unfortunate than other men. I never went to one of the public offices, during office hours, without finding the clerks at their posts. Perhaps, when the gentleman called, the clerk whose business it was to give him the information required, was sick. We all know, Mr. Speaker, what the duties of the clerks, as well as the Heads of the Departments are, during the time Congress is in session. For nearly one half of a session, this House is inundated with resolutions calling for documents and information, and to comply with the calls made, these clerks are often employed nights as well as days. Were their salaries fixed, or their appointments made, under this Administration? No, but let it not be said, however, that, as a friend of this Administration, I object to any investigation as to them. If any thing can be found to be retrenched, let it be done.

H. OF R.]

Retrenchment.

But another charge against this Administration is preferred, and, consequently, another reason for inquiry is given, by the gentleman from North Carolina. The waiters of this House are employed by members in folding the Anti-Jackson Convention Address, written by Chapman Johnson, to be sent off to the South, to produce a re-action in the public mind. If there be nothing in those addresses which are unanswerable, the gentleman ought not to be alarmed. He says he is not, and that the South will do her duty. And, if so, why has Chapman Johnson's name been brought into this debate? The waiters of this House are paid by the day; and, if not employed in folding these addresses, they would have been doing nothing. Ought the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON] complain, when the same waiters have been employed in folding extra Telegraphs, containing billiard table speeches, which, as the gentleman from North Carolina has intimated, in his reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WRIGHT] have had a wonderful effect, and have wrought great changes in the public mind? If the People receive light from one source, and are willing to receive it from another, let it not be withheld. But, sir, if there be any abuses in this House, who are answerable for them? The President of the United States? No, sir; but we the members; and let, therefore, the Committee extend their inquiries to the contingent expenses of this House, and the appropriations which are made to meet them. We ought to look into them, more especially as I am told there are some gentlemen from Kentucky, whose conscientious scruples will not permit them to receive the penknives that are laid on our desks, and who carry to their constituents certificates signed by the Clerk of this House, that they did not receive them. From present appearances, we shall not adjourn until the return of the season for that wholesome beverage, soda water, which we have been in the habit of drinking at the public expense. The Committee can inquire whether this cannot be dispensed with. I am anxious about this, because this, as well as the knives in some sections of the country, is put down to the charge of this Administration. We have called for charges and specifications, Mr. Speaker, against this Administration, and have pledged ourselves to meet them. If, when gentlemen had preferred all they are to bring forward, and we do meet them satisfactorily to unprejudiced minds, would it be unreasonable in us to require them forever after to hold their peace? Will gentlemen in the Opposition agree to this? It is not unreasonable in us to require this at their hand. Now, sir, let us attend to all these charges, and what are they? The appointment of Mr. King, the payment of John A. King, the money paid John H. Pleasants, the construction given by the President of the United States to a section of the Constitution referred to in his first Message on the Panama Mission. These are all the charges which were first preferred. There are others which were subsequently preferred to which I shall call the attention of the House when I turn my view to him who preferred them. The appointment of Mr. King was not solicited by him, and was by him accepted with reluctance. It is within the recollection of this House, that the mission was, in the first place, offered to a distinguished individual of the State of New York, who was then, as he is now, the Governor of that State. When he declined it, the acceptance of Mr. King was considered rather in the light of a favor conferred upon the Government, than on him: as it was generally acknowledged that of all the men in the nation, he was the best qualified to settle the difficulties then subsisting between this nation and England. But Mr. King became sick, and in consequence of sickness, was unable to adjust, or to attempt the adjustment, of our difficulties with England. His sickness continuing, he asked to be recalled, was recalled; and, shortly after reaching his home, died. Then, sir, for this sickness of Mr. King, to which any man who is sent abroad is liable—for this act of God, this Administration is to be put down. I have nothing more to say in relation to this charge: let the People, let a candid world judge of it. John A. King was left at the Court of St. James, as Chargé d'Affaires, returned to this country, and was paid for his services as others have been paid under all the preceding Administrations, for similar services, as was abundantly proved by the documents submitted to us last Winter. If in this the Administration has done wrong, so have all which preceded it. John H. Pleasants received, as the bearer of despatches, the usual sum, and no more. He was destined for South America, was prevented by sickness going the whole distance, employed a gentleman to finish what he had commenced; the despatches were delivered in season, and the service was performed to the satisfaction of the Government. And why do gentlemen so often rely upon this as a charge against this Administration? Why does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLORE] so often refer to this transaction, to put down this Administration? Is it because he has nothing better to allege, or because he has no great friendship for John H. Pleasants? Who is John H. Pleasants? A son of Virginia, an Editor of an Administration paper, published, too, at Richmond, acknowledged by all to be a man of first rate talents. A son of one of the distinguished citizens of that State—his father for a number of years a member of this House, a member for a number of years, of the other branch of the National Legislature, and afterwards Governor of the State of Virginia; who has received, if not all the honors, the highest honors that Virginia could confer upon him. He now holds an office under this corrupt Administration. Suffer me, Mr. Speaker, to refer to another charge, which was omitted in the emendation made—a charge made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON.] Mr. Rochester, we are told by him, after he was appointed Secretary of Legation, remained in the country, was receiving the money of the Government, and electioneered for an important office in the State of New York. It is true, sir, that Mr. Rochester's name was used for an important office, but it is also true, that he was not in that State at the time of his nomination; that he was not in New York at any time before the election; and it is also true, that he did not know that his name was so used, until within a very short time before the election took place. For services as Secretary of Legation he was entitled to pay from the time of the ratification of his nomination by the Senate; perhaps he received pay from that period. He was at all times ready to embark for South America, and the gentleman from North Carolina knows the reason why the mission did not set sail before Fall—it was in consequence of the sickness, the prevalence of the yellow fever, at the place where the Ministers were to assemble. It is unnecessary at this time to go into a discussion on the propriety of the Panama Mission; it has been fully discussed; it has received the sanction of both Houses, and has been approved by the nation. What would not have been said against this Administration, if the invitation to attend the meeting at Panama had not been accepted? Because, Sir, the meeting has not taken place as was expected, is the Administration to be inculpated, when its failure was owing to causes over which we had no control?

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to another charge preferred by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON]—a charge of ignorance or corruption, because the Executive of the United States does not construe the second paragraph of the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States just as he does. That gentleman, after quoting from recollection, a part of the President's first message, in which he says, if the gentleman's quotation be correct, (speaking of the Panama Mission,) although the appointment of Ministers was within his constitutional competency, he preferred, for reasons given in the message, laying the subject before the Senate. Now, the gentleman from North Carolina says the President must be ignorant or corrupt, for such a construction of that part of the Constitution referred to. Sir, all I can say on this subject, is this, that here is a case in which doctors disagree—the President of the United States is on one side, and the gentleman from North Carolina on the other; it is a question about which great men may differ. The Senate of the United States were also divided; it would not be altogether decorous for the President of the United States to say, because he differed from the gentleman from North Carolina, that he is ignorant or corrupt, and perhaps the imputations of the gentleman from North Carolina are not altogether correct. Admit, Sir, the President's construction was incorrect, the consequences contended for do not follow—the President might have innocently erred. I confess, Sir, it is not within my constitutional competency to decide, when such men differ. This is all I have to say relative to this charge. There is one charge against this Administration, which I have seen in the newspapers, which the gentlemen opposed to us have omitted. I regret this, because it would be improper for me to make charges for the purpose of answering them, and I regret the more, because, in the omission, they may have unintentionally done injustice to their friends. I will, in passing, refer them to it: The Secretary employed a clerk in one of the Departments to carry the laws of the United States to Vermont—his influence with the members of the Legislature of that State was so great, that the exercise of it prevented the election of a gentleman to the other branch of the National Legislature, who professed great friendship for this Administration, but who was suspected not to possess all he professed to have, and who, as subsequent events have shewn, did not possess all he professed to have. I refer gentlemen to this, because I should like to have all at once, and do not like to meet things piecemeal. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might as well now, as at any other time, meet an objection made by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. FLOYD] which has been made by another gentleman, whose remarks I have not yet noticed. At first I thought it best to reserve my remarks upon this objection until I came to the other gentleman's remarks. Mr. Adams, we are told by the gentleman from Virginia, claimed an outfit for going from Russia to Ghent, and this too was in 1815, not, of course, under the present Administration. Four thousand five hundred dollars only were allowed; in the settlement of his accounts, while he was Secretary of State under Mr. Monroe, the claim for the balance was persisted in by him, and the question of allowance, or not, was referred to the law officer of the Government, the Attorney General of the United States, who considered the case so clear, that he unhesitatingly reported in favor of the allowance; it was, in the settlement of his accounts at the Treasury Department, allowed and paid. This, Sir, strange as it may appear, is exhibited as a charge against this Administration. Does the honorable member from Virginia set his own opinion up in opposition to the Attorney General of the United States? Does he say that opinion was incorrect? But still, it is a charge against this Administration, this allowance to Mr. Adams under the Administration of Mr. Monroe. It appears to me, Sir, that, in making this charge, the honorable member has travelled out of the record. Mr. Monroe is not now on trial, and we cannot try one case in the bowels of another. I have always been told, that what was pertinent to the issue, was admissible evidence, and that alone. To what shifts are gentlemen driven in order to pull down this wicked Administration; to what straits are they forced? Let us take cognizance of the case, what does it amount to? Why, that Mr. Adams conceived that he was entitled to 4500 dollars, in addition to what he received, and that the authorities of the Government thought he was entitled to it, and the same was paid him. Where, from this view, can we find the evidence of the charges which are brought against the Administration? Where the sinecures? Where the increased salaries? Where the increase of officers? A few Clerks have been added to the Departments, and some have been dismissed, as the Departments to which they were attached did not require the number which had been employed. But neither the President nor his Secretaries did this—it was the result of Legislative enactment. The Postmaster General is the only officer in the Government whose salary has been increased; I well recollect this: the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who cries aloud on all occasions—a gentleman from Georgia, not now here, but at this time the Governor of that State, [Mr. FOSBERT] and myself, formed the trio that voted against it. I was not opposed to an increase, but was opposed to so great an increase—not because I did not conceive the Head of that office entitled to it, but because we were legislating for the office and not for the man; and that the incumbent would not, as some gentlemen had prayed the Revolutionary soldiers would, live forever. I stated then, and I repeat it now, that no man did, or could, hold that officer in higher estimation than I did. But why should the House be detained by this war of words, this parade about extravagance, profligacy, and corruption, since we are told by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] that no committee that we can appoint will be able to find any thing in the proposed investigation to find fault with—the very limb upon which the mover of these resolutions stood, has been cut off by the gentleman from South Carolina, and he suffered to fall having nothing left for his support. Another gentleman [Mr. RANDOLPH] is apprehensive that, so far from the proposed investigation furnishing any thing to condemn the Administration, it may result in keeping up a sinking cause, and consequently this is not the accepted time. He gives his friends (the honorable gentlemen from Kentucky) [Mr. CHILTON and Mr. DANIEL] a rap over the knuckles, in telling them that young doctors are not called upon for their medicine; raw hands who have just signed the portage bill, must learn to follow the directions of others, but must not pretend to lead or direct in any thing.

With a few remarks in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania who had the floor yesterday, [Mr. INGRAM] I will leave this discussion to other hands; and if, in following that gentleman, I am obliged to travel out of the record, let the error rest with him, and not with me: for surely, if the gentleman has wandered in making his attack, I shall be excused in wandering from the question now before the House, in defending. It is certainly to be regretted that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not been influenced by the advice which he was so willing to give to others. We are told by him that this discussion ought to be confined to what is before the

House, and ought not to be extended to what is not before the House; that we ought not to defend ourselves against charges when none are made; that this Administration is not answerable for the offices which have been created, nor the salaries which are paid those who are in office; the proposition is to inquire into the expenditure of moneys at the disposal of the President and his Secretaries, to see if there have been any abuses; that in the settlement of the accounts at the Treasury, there are some accounts the settlement of which the President directs, without specifications—into these would he look. We will see, by following the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether he has confined himself to what he deems to be the proposition before the House. John A. King is again brought before us, and the gentleman has intimated that the settlement of this account, and the payment of the money which he received, was a matter of secrecy; that, when it was known that these accounts were settled, and the sum paid was also known, the Secretary of State issued his mandate, and every Clerk in his Department was called before him, each one expecting to be dismissed, and each asked, did you give the information? did you, or you? and told that, whenever it should be found out who did give the information, that he who gave the information should be dismissed. And the gentleman would have it believed that the settlement of these accounts was a private settlement, and the Administration had an interest in keeping it from the public: that these were accounts settled, too, and paid by direction of the President, without specifications. Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken; there was no secrecy, there could have been none; it would be idle for a moment to believe there could have been any; the accounts were settled, and the money paid, not by the direction of the President, and not without specifications; and the gentleman ought to have known this, as we had the whole transaction before us last Winter, but in conformity with the law of the land and the settled usages of the Department; and there is no foundation for the parade which the gentleman has made, relative to the calling on and threatening the clerks for divulging this secret: this I am authorized to say. It was well known that John A. King came to this city to settle his accounts; his business here was notorious. While here he was at large, and nothing like secrecy did, and nothing like secrecy could mark the transaction. The settlement of those accounts was at all times subject to our inspection, liable to be laid before us when called for, and laid before us, in fact as soon as the call was made. Where, then, is the abuse, and if none, why is this transaction referred to, and these suggestions made, but to poison the public mind? And if the gentleman is disposed to regard at all the professions with which he commenced, and the advice he was so free to give others, why does he refer to the settlement of Mr. Adams's accounts, under Mr. Monroe's administration, and reiterate the charge of the gentleman from Virginia, unless for an effect here or elsewhere? Is this, sir, confining the discussion to what is before the House? What has the detached parts of the letter read by the gentleman to do with the proposition before the House? Nothing; yet still they make no charges, and we were not called upon to defend. The gentleman, in his candor, tells us, he is not willing this House should try what belongs to the People to try, and what they will try, this Administration; yet, for fear they should well and truly try, with the same candor we are told, that, in the late election, the spirit of the Constitution was violated, and the Administration is compared to a man who breaks into his house, who is entitled to no indulgence from him, after this forcible entry, for the good care he has taken of the house and furniture while in possession; and that, in the trial of this Administration, it is necessary to go back to the election, or to a period anterior to it. Now, sir, all these remarks are uncalled for, and according to the gentleman's own declaration, do not belong to the proposition before the House; they must then have been made for the benefit of those tries (the People) who are to try this Administration. As to the late election, inasmuch as we spent six weeks, the first session of the last Congress, in discussing the resolution of an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. M'Duffrie] to alter the Constitution, and in that discussion, fully investigated the late Presidential election; and discussions for the benefit of the People have been had, relative to that election, from that time to this, the gentleman might, with propriety, have refrained from the remarks which he has made, as he has always been at liberty to disclose all he knows, calling in question the purity of that election, and if he had known any thing, has never been in want of a disposition to make the disclosure. What will satisfy the gentleman? It is impossible to tell. In answer to extracts from two messages of the President, read by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WATSON] recommending economy in all our appropriations, he tells us, that this was intended for political effect, and, consequently, the President is entitled to no merit for the recommendation. If he had not made the recommendations, then this Administration would have been a profligate and prodigal Administration, and must of course have been put down. Do what they will, the gentleman's objections to them remain—if the act be good, then the quo animo is bad, and if the quo animo is good, why then, in truth, the act is bad, as is shown in the missions to England and Panama. If both the act and the quo animo are good, why then, Sir, the spirit of the Constitution was violated in the late election for President. What, I ask, in God's name, can or will command the respect, or merit the approbation, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? And further, if the affairs of the General Government have been well and faithfully administered, he would have us look at the attempts to influence the State Legislatures. Printers of the laws have been dismissed, and the only reason assigned for the dismissal of one, was his abuse of the Administration that employed him, referring, as I presume the gentleman did, to the case of Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire. If the Administration be prepared to assign as good reasons for all their acts, as for this, they will stand higher in my estimation than they now do; the employment of our enemies is bad policy, and no administration can be sustained by it. Some of the editors of the public journals which print the laws, are now in open hostility to the Administration that gives them their patronage. The patronage of the Administration belongs, all other things being equal, to those who support the Administration; and I am pleased to learn from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that those in power have adopted or, if you please, are about to adopt, this principle. When General Jackson is made President, we shall not complain if he does the same; by doing it he can satisfy but a few of the hungry expectants—a different course would disappoint the whole. But, sir, what are these attempts to influence State Legislatures? We have been referred to the case of the removal of one of the printers of the laws, and I have referred to the case of his dismissal. I know of no such an attempt. I have heard of State Legislatures proscribing individuals, because they would not worship this idol, and I would refer the gentleman to the case of William Clarke, late Treasurer of the State of Pennsylvania. Connected with the charge which the gentleman has made, of attempts on the part of this Administration to influence the State Legislatures, he has referred to the employment of John Binns, of Philadelphia, to print the laws, and to furnish the stationery and printing for the customhouse; and, if he had the power, he would brand him with infamy, for libeling a distinguished individual, whom he charged with the murder of six militia men. John Binns is not now on trial id if he was, he would not require my aid, to vindicate am from any aspersions that may be cast upon him; he not here to answer for himself, and if he were, could ot: for we are privileged men, and not accountable for hat we say. John Binns and the gentleman from Pennsylvania are not, therefore, on an equal footing; if they ere, he could vindicate himself; if he libelled General Jackson, are there not persons the gentleman has libelled?

 or he too has published his pamphlet for the benefit of the People. John Binns is a respectable magistrate in the second city in the Union, and has the confidence of the People, to as great an extent as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. John Binns once belonged to the same party in Pennsylvania that gentleman belonged to, and it was successful; John Binns once belonged to a party in that state which opposed that gentleman, and his party, and put them down. John Binns will show the gentleman, in less than one year from now, what he has done, he will do again, and the gentleman will find himself again in the minority.

[Here the SPEAKER called Mr. FRANK to order, as personalities could not be allowed.]

I ask pardon, Sir, and will desist, although I would have been pleased to have run the parallel further. Let us, Mr. Speaker, for a moment, turn to the contingent fund, or money annually appropriated to meet the contingent expenses of this Government: for this is the fund which is liable, if I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to such gross abuses, and from which, as one would suppose from the tenor of his arguments, a good share of the patronage of the Administration is derived.
 How stands the case? By the Constitution, "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but, in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."
 No moneys can be drawn without appropriations. And who makes the appropriations? Not the President and his Secretaries, but Congress. A reference to the Treasury estimate for the current year will perhaps best explain the nature of the contingent expenses, and the fund provided for defraying of them. The whole amount asked for, is $ 8,990,380 44—and of this sum, the following sums to defray the contingent expenses of the Department of State:

For Books,	$2,000
Binding Books,	500
Stationery and Parchment,	1,500
Mediterranean Passports,	1,500
Blank Personal Passports, Circulars, &c.	1,000
Fuel and Candles,	900
Newspapers for the Office and Agents abroad,	500
Translations of Foreign Languages,	350
Forage for Messengers' horses,	200
Expenses in distributing Congressional Docu- ments,	300
Wages of a laborer,	300
Miscellanies,	1,000
Extra Copying of Papers,	1,000
Printing in Newspapers, and in Pamphlet Form, the Laws of the first Session of 20th Congress,	13,500
Distribution of the Acts of Congress through- out the States and Territories,	3,000
	$ 27,550

Now, of the whole of this sum, amounting to twenty-even thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, not one cent of it is at the command of the President, nor can one cent of it be paid or expended in a way to escape our examination, and not to be open to our inspection.
 Let the committee ascertain, if the Standing Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State has not already done to their satisfaction, whether this sum, the usual appropriation, has not been applied to the usual and ordinary purposes, and settlements made in the common and ordinary form—whether vouchers have not been taken for all the money paid, and whether secrecy veils any part of this expenditure. An examination of the acts of Congress will show, that this is the usual amount appropriated for that Department, and the other Departments and offices have, to defray similar expenses, annual appropriations. I have referred to the State Department, because it was the first mentioned in the Treasury estimate.

 In addition to these appropriations for the Departments and offices, a sum of money has heretofore been asked for, and appropriated—sometimes fifty thousand dollars, but seldom less than half that sum, to defray the contin-gent expenses of foreign intercourse; but this extravagant Administration require for the year 1828, no appropriation whatever to defray this expense. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has, no doubt, amused the House with his statement of moneys paid, and accounts directed to be settled by the President, without specifications, but did not inform the House in what cases this was done, and how often it was done, or whether, under this Administration, it had been ever done. Sometimes, our Ministers abroad find it necessary to employ men to go from one Court to another, on private business, which the interest of the nation requires should be kept secret. For this they are paid a stipulated sum, and in the settlement of the Minister's accounts, this sum paid by them out of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, is directed by the President to be allowed without specification, and this is the only money, to my knowledge, which is paid in this way. It has not been, under any Administration, a frequent occurrence, and I am not aware that, under this, there has been a case of the kind. So much for these payments, and this source of Government patronage.
 And, as this Administration asks for no appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, how do the charges, imputations, and suggestions made, stand?
 If, then, Mr. Speaker, the Administration be not answerable for the number of officers, and the amount paid them; if the contingent expenses of the different Departments and offices are not larger than they have heretofore been; are paid in the usual way; if those in power ask nothing for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, what will they be called upon next to answer to?
 After all, to give to the world the gentleman's objections in a few words, he does not like this administration, and those now in office must be turned out, and a change must take place, or the Government will be destroyed, and the country ruined. I will trouble the House no longer; and if I have occasionally travelled out of the road in the course of my remarks, I have had to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and this is my apology for so doing.

Mr. BELL addressed the House to the following effect:
 When this discussion commenced, I did not suppose that any thing could possibly occur which would draw me into its vortex. It is not, my fault that I am now induced to engage in it. I feel, however, driven to the necessity of throwing myself upon the indulgence of the House, for a few moments, by what has been thrown out in the course of the debate. I trust I shall not indulge in that discursive range of remark which has distinguished the course of gentlemen who have preceded me, on both sides of the question.

On a motion to lay the resolution on the table, I voted in the affirmative. Although the House could have felt no interest in the motive of that vote, yet it was, perhaps, due to myself to have explained the reasons which influenced me in giving it, (without being prompted to do so by the insinuations of any gentleman,) that it might not appear to be inconsistent with the vote I may now give,

Retrenchment.

and the course I shall steadily pursue in the future stages of this measure. Now, no other alternative is left me. The question has been significantly propounded to some of the more prominent gentlemen who voted as I did upon that question, Did they mean to stifle inquiry while they continued to urge the charge of prodigality and abuse in the public expenditures, against the administration?—Without supposing for one moment, that my vote could be of sufficient consequence to attract the attention of any gentleman, upon this or any other question, yet, as I would not rest under any censure which may be attempted to be cast on others, I answer to the interrogatory for myself—No. And if a direct charge of such an unfair intention was intended to be made, I answer, that the gentleman who made it could not have believed it true.

When the original resolutions were introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, I saw in their ill-digested form (and when I say this, I do not mean to say that I could have given them a better shape) the substance of a proposition for a general retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. To a well-timed proposition of that nature, I beg leave to say, I would never be opposed. Inquiries into supposed excesses in the regular and ordinary appropriations for the support of Government, or into the abuses supposed to attend their disbursement by its officers, will always be productive of some good in Government, constituted on whatever principles it may, although no immediate legislative enactment of a remedial nature may be the result of them. The very discussions which attend propositions for such inquiries, serve to keep alive a spirit of jealousy and watchfulness in the People in regard to that, which, when properly managed, constitutes their strength, and which, under evil auspices, may be converted into the material of their weakness. For, in the estimate of a nation's strength, this paradox intrudes itself—that which forms the chief sinew of its power, may, at the same time, become the source of its greatest debility. National wealth (if I may be permitted a common-place argument) can no where be as safely and properly exhibited as in the hands of the People who created it; and there it should remain, except such portion of it as may be absolutely necessary for the protection and free enjoyment of the balance. When, therefore, a nation shall have arrived at that point in its organization, when it deliberates upon the expediency of abolishing certain institutions as useless or improper, and of curtailing certain expenditures as extravagant, we may take it for granted that the annual modicum of the People's wealth, which is absolutely necessary to be drawn from their pockets, is already large enough, and that no new institutions will be created, and no additional exactions enforced. But I go farther. I would have supported a well-timed proposition of this nature, for a better reason. I have entertained the opinion, as I do now, that the expenditures in some branches of the public service would bear retrenchment without injury to the interests of the country, and to the very great relief of the People. I have thought that the career of this Government, during a late administration, was marked with a wasteful appropriation of the public revenue, and that the present administration has entitled itself to still higher distinction in the same prodigal course. I believe, too, that the present administration contemplated, at one time, still greater eminence in this way, than they have since thought it prudent to attain. I am of opinion, that, for a part of this extravagance, the Executive officers of the Government are alone responsible, and that Congress may well come in for the balance of the responsibility. How this responsibility should be divided between those two departments of the Government, I will not undertake to determine; nor will I at this time, be drawn into a specification of instances of the extravagance in the Executive officers of the Government; neither will I be forced, upon this occasione, into an argument of the specifications that others have thought proper to make in the course of this debate. In speaking of the extravagance of the Government, I beg leave to state, that my opinion, if it may be regarded as of any consequence, has been formed upon facts which I have never heard disputed; and what I may now, or at any other time, say of the conduct of the present administration, will be found to be based upon ascertained facts, about which I expect to speak freely, without the imputation of joining in a hue and cry merely for party purposes. I despise a senseless clamor as much as any man, but I am not prepared to admit that this is one. The inquiry may shew how this is.

Whether a Government is extravagant or not, I look upon as a question about which gentlemen may differ according to the notions they may entertain of the policy of a Government in relation to its expenditures. Some are of opinion that the Government should array itself in some degree of splendor, believing that the respect and reverence of the People may be secured in that way, while others entertain the opinion I have already expressed upon that point. As to the question, whether, in the disbursement of the funds placed under the discretionary control of any of the Executive Departments of the Government, any part of those funds has been applied to illegal or corrupt uses, I concur in the sentiment expressed by a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLARK] whose dignified and manly course in this debate must gain him the respect of every gentleman upon this floor, although some of them may not agree with him in political opinion. That gentleman said, that upon the eve of the investigation, reason, justice, and Christian charity, require that the testimony should be heard before sentence of guilt should be pronounced. So let it be. But the question recurs, why is the proposition ill-timed; or, in the language so often and so emphatically repeated, why is this not the accepted time? Answering for myself, I can say, that I regarded the time as particularly unfavorable. Looking upon the resolution as intended to effect a permanent retrenchment in the ordinary expenditures of the Government, I believed that such a dispassionate inquiry into the various and intricate details as would be necessary to a judicious retrenchment, could not be expected at this time. I was also aware, that, whatever professions might be made by the supporters of the measure in the House—out of it, party views and party purposes would be said to be at the bottom of it. It further occurred to me, that the best temper imaginable, and all the forbearance that could be practised, would not be sufficient to prevent party feelings from mingling themselves with the consideration of the measure here, and that thus no important practical result could be attained. Looking at the measure in this aspect, I felt opposed to it on other grounds. Whatever may be the state of the great question between the parties out of this House, it is admitted that the opposition to the Administration has the majority in the House. Whatever measures, therefore, of an extraordinary nature, wearing the appearance of a party origin, the majority might bring forward, would subject them to the charge of attempting to put their adversaries to the wall, by the mere force of numerical strength.

Upon a point of honor and of common courtesy, therefore, might opposition to the resolution be justified. The joy of the generous huntsman is always in the chase; the game once overtaken, he calls off the pack that would worry, and, by slow tortures, kill it. So the generous, high-minded political opponent, is disposed to mitigate the severity of his blows upon a weakened adversary. I speak now in reference to the state of the parties in this House. How the question stands out of this House, must be determined by those without, by their own weapons, and in their own way, as it is fit and proper it should.

Retrenchment.

[H. or R.]

But, again: If there be any one point in the American character better understood than another, it is the disposition to sympathise with, and take the part of the weak, whether guilty or innocent, when in the hands of an exulting and victorious adversary. It is the temper of humanity. The convicted traitor is forgiven by the humane crowd as he ascends the scaffold. The fate of the Royal captive is generously pitied, even by stern Republicans, when they hear the shouts of the conquerors; and so the falling statesman may sometimes cherish faint hopes from the violence of his pursuers. I would not add to the asperity of party feeling in this House, by having it understood that the cases I have selected to illustrate a common principle of our nature, are pointed with allusions to any individual whatever. Did the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARREN] think of this trait in the American character, the other day, when he invoked abuse upon the Administration, by provoking, in the most artful manner I have ever seen employed, upon any occasion, every gentleman who he supposed could be induced, at his call, to denounce it in harsh language? Did he seek to take advantage of this principle of our nature, when he sought to elicit a reiteration of the charge of corruption against the Administration, by the frequent use he made of that term as coming from others, when, I believe, not one gentleman on the opposite side of the question made any such charge in this debate, whatever may be the opinion upon that point, disclosed in other places? But, other gentlemen seem to me to have indulged in a course of argument calculated, I will not say intended, to accomplish the same purpose: for, although I have noticed much in the argument of some of them, of fair and manly reply to what has been thrown out by gentlemen opposed to them in political opinions, yet, it has appeared to me, that besides attacking their opponents in turn, there has been a bitterness of manner, and a point in their allusions, which could scarcely fail of widening the door of recrimination. I know, that the high-mettled courser disdains the use of the goad, and is ever ready to take the track without being spurred to it; yet, there should be some adequate manifestation of an intention to apply the spur before the leap is made. Here has been introduced a resolution, which may, if you please to have it so, be considered as implicating the Administration in extravagance and prodigality; and it may be, or has been, intimated by one gentleman, that it was honestly brought forward under the influence of the intoxication, produced by having drunk deep of the spirit of newspaper misrepresentation; yet, without stopping to inquire whether gentlemen on the other side of the question may not have been misled by having drunk from the same polluted stream, I would ask why call for specifications of charges against the Administration, when the very object of the resolution is alleged to be to inquire into the grounds of such charges? And why will gentlemen continue, as they have done, to proclaim their convictions of the purity of the Administration, and the absence of corruption, if they do not seek for some purpose, a discussion upon those points, when no gentleman opposed to the Administration, as far as my knowledge extends, has thought proper to afford a just pretext for any such discussion? But I do not wish to do injustice to the intentions of any gentleman. I would not do injustice to the gentleman from Ohio, especially. It certainly appeared to me the other day, as I think it must have appeared to every gentleman on this floor, that it was a principal object of his remarks to court a violent and abusive course, on the part of the opposition, against the Administration. I would not, however, do the gentleman from Ohio a voluntary wrong for a reason connected with my own repose. He is one of the last gentlemen upon this floor, whose notice I would be pleased with, in reply to any thing I may say; and as a proof of my sincerity, if he will accept of a compliment from one who is a stranger to him, I will say, he seems to me to understand his business here perfectly well; and of his skill in political archery, I would say, he discriminates between the sound and the broken arrows of the Administration quiver, with as much judgment as any gentleman I have noticed practising with its bow. But to proceed with my explanation: I was opposed to the resolution, seeing that it must wear a party livery, because, with my approbation, (and I trust gentlemen will give me credit for sincerity, when I make the declaration,) no inflammable matter of that kind would be thrown into this House, to retard and obstruct the ordinary business of Congress, or to interrupt the decorum of debate during the present session. I desired, as, indeed, I thought every other member of this House did, from the frequent professions I heard upon all sides, that we should despatch the more important business confided to our care, and return to our homes. I deprecated the consequences of bringing the Presidential canvass into this House, and making this floor an electioneering Campus. We have already had a specimen, in the two last days' debate, of the consequence of introducing such matter into this House. We have already had a match exhibition of reciprocal attack and reply. We have already reached the very verge of order and decorum. Perhaps, sir, we have advanced one step beyond their boundaries. To what end will a further indulgence of this course lead in the discussion of this or any other measure of a like inflammable character? As the passions of the opposite parties kindle by collision—as they will—we may expect to hear from one side of the House, a glowing description of the dangers of military despotism, while, from the other, we will present the picture of a great nation sinking by corruption. When, from the other side, shall be held up to public view, the evils to be apprehended from the elevation of a Military Chieftain; on this side, you shall hear of the ills that will ensue from establishing a succession, by adhering to the line of safe precedents. When we shall have carried this war or crimination and recrimination to the highest pitch to which party feeling can ascend, all we shall be able to accomplish will be, perhaps, to degrade the character of the Congress of the United States, consume ourselves in the heat of controversy, and vomit forth, through the channel of the newspapers, upon the People of this Union, the poison of our own gall, to embitter and stir them up to a like useless rage.

"It is not, nor cannot come to, good."

No opinion will be changed by such a course, and the People are too enlightened to authorize the belief that the relative strength of the parties out of this House can be affected by it. I would say to the Opposition, to which I profess to belong, that they have nothing now to gain by such a course, though they may not lose. To the friends of the Administration I would say, if they will allow me, that they cannot, by means like these, give a counter current to public opinion, if that is necessary to their success. I will say to the Opposition, again, that I trust they will have the firmness not to be intimidated to take a course which would be unbecoming the dignity of this House, or unworthy of the cause in which they are engaged; but while they deal out measure for measure, with their political opponents, they will never become the aggressors.

I feel it my duty, before I sit down, to notice one or two remarks which fell from gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. An honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BUCKNER] in reply to a distinguished gentleman [Mr. RANDOLPH] who has taken part in this debate, remarked, in substance, that, when "the accepted time" arrived, so anxiously expected by that gentleman, he had long since made up his mind to retreat from the Capitol.

If I do not mistake the allusion, or overate the apprehensions of that gentleman, I will say to him, that I know he will not forsake his country at the approach either of a domestic or foreign foe. On the contrary, if I am not greatly mistaken in him, he would not shrink from the presence of a tyrant, even in his strong-hold; and when "the accepted time" alluded to, shall have arrived, I predict that that gentleman, returning to his post here, with the manly purpose of guarding his country's rights, will then become convinced how greatly he had misconceived the true character of the individual so often alluded to. I am persuaded he will find that great man, though, perhaps, not perfect—as no man is—yet so nobly redeeming any slight faults he may have, by his generous devotion to the interests of his country, by his tact in civil government, as well as in military command, that even the most unrelenting of his opponents will feel some regret that they ever felt it their duty to encourage apprehensions which turned out to be so destitute of any foundation.

The Tariff has found its way into this discussion. Upon a subject of so much difficulty and importance, I would at no time feel myself competent to manage the argument, either for or against it. I am, therefore at this time, wholly indisposed to enter into any examination of the questions connected with it, but I do trust in God, that no gentleman on this floor—I must be permitted to express a further hope—that no friend of his country, will be found here, or any where else, who will seek, for any purpose, to connect a subject of such intrinsic interest, with a contest, involving, in my opinion, separate and distinct principles and objects. I do not mean to state, that any gentleman in this House has sought to connect these subjects—far from it. I only express a hope, that no gentleman will ever make himself obnoxious to such a charge.

Mr. Speaker, although opposed to the resolution originally, for reasons I have attempted to make intelligible to the House, yet I fear we have advanced too far now to recede. Expectations are created, that something will be done, without farther delay, in the work of retrenchment. At all events, an inquiry, a rigid inquiry, must be prosecuted—and I hope for the best results. I am free to declare, for myself, although I would lop off, without compunction or regret, every institution and office, which may be opposed in its tendency to the liberty of the People, or which may create unnecessary burdens upon their honest gains, yet would I forbear to touch either one or the other, which may, upon inquiry, appear to be essential either to the liberty or to the prosperity of the country. And since it has become necessary that this inquiry must be gone into, I rejoice that so large a majority are of opinion that this is the auspicious period, and that so much of the talent of the House has become pledged to assist in it. I look upon the vote taken upon the motion to lay this resolution upon the table, as a pledge, not only of the perseverance with which the work of retrenchment will be prosecuted, but of the success which will attend it. And I trust that we shall all, exercising a spirit of mutual forbearance upon those points, upon which the interests and feelings of parties may be connected, zealously co-operate in effecting something for the good of our common country. For my own part I can only promise that I will aid in the enterprise, by working as a common laborer in the trenches, if it be necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I will ask the indulgence of the House no longer.

After an ineffectual motion to adjourn, Mr. DORSEY, of Maryland, took the floor, but had not proceeded far, before a motion for adjournment was made and carried.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1828.

THE SIX MILITIAMEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the proceedings of the Court Martial which tried certain Tennessee Militia at Mobile, in December, 1814, together with other papers connected with the subject, which were called for by this House some days since.

The letter was read.

Mr. SLOANE moved that the communication and documents be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE expressed a doubt whether it was necessary to print all the documents accompanying this communication—perhaps the member from Ohio [Mr. SLOANE] might be better able to say than he was—but as he wished to have an opportunity of looking at them, he would suggest to the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the printing.

Mr. SLOANE replied, that the chief bulk of the documents consisted of the muster roll and pay roll which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had himself introduced into the call.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentlemen that a motion to lay on the table did not admit of debate—but that, if the gentleman from Kentucky wished to reply, his only mode would be to have the motion decided.

Mr. WICKLIFFE having moved for a division, the question was first taken on laying the communication and documents on the table, and carried in the affirmative. And the question being then on the motion to print—

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to postpone the printing; and said, he would briefly state his reasons for this motion. The House had before it in discussion a resolution, [Mr. CHILTON's] which completely blocked up the game of legislation; and, in this state of things, the House is called upon to print these documents for public information. I wish it clearly understood that, so far as I act in this matter, it is not from any fear of having the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, fully exposed to view. But I appeal to the candor of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SLOANE] not to press the printing at this moment. Let me refer to the facts. When these documents were first inquired for, we were informed by the official, or at least semi-official organ of the Administration, [here Mr. W. pointed to the Reporter's desk of the Intelligencer], that no such documents existed in the Department of War. Subsequently, however, some time in the Summer, they were discovered, in some obscure pigeon-hole, I suppose, in that Department. Now, Sir, as the effect of the call for these papers (I do not say the intention—I speak only of the effect—it is not parliamentary to reflect on the motives of gentlemen) has respect to individual character, and as I cannot shut my eyes and ears to all that is passing around me, I have no doubt that, before this resolution was introduced, these papers had all been inspected at the Department, and I therefore cannot but understand the effect that is anticipated. I ask, then, is it fair—I appeal to the magnanimity of the gentleman from Ohio to say whether it is fair—when the character of an individual is assailed, not to let his friends have an opportunity of looking at these documents, in order that they may judge whether there may not be something else in the War Department, bearing on the matter to which they refer, is order that, if there is, (and I do not say there is) that also may be obtained, and then the whole be printed at one time, and all go together to the world. If you print them now, the effect will be to assault the character of a distinguished individual, both morally and politically, and what, Sir, may be the result on the public mind? It will be recollected that, among the documents I wished to obtain, was the order of Governor Blount, detailing the regiments of Tennessee Militia. Is that among these documents? The Secretary of War tells us he has furnished all the documents within the scope of the resolution, that is, as he understands it. Now, Sir, when the printing of papers is not calculated to facilitate legislation, but only to effect the character of an individual, I ask again, is it not fair, that we shall see whether there may not be other documents, which may be called for, and which might have an effect in illustrating those we have obtained? I do not say there are such documents. And, if this was an ordinary subject of legislation, a proposition to amend the militia laws, or any thing of that description—if individual character was not to be involved, I should not resist the printing. But when it is impossible I should be deceived as to the effect of the documents, I appeal to the magnanimity of the gentleman and of the House, to say whether it will not be better to defer it?

Mr. BARTLETT now moved to lay the motion to print upon the table. The motion prevailed, and Mr. SLOANE's motion to print the communication and documents was accordingly laid upon the table.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House then proceeded again to consider the resolution of Mr. CHILTON on the subject of retrenchment, and the question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAKE, (virtually a substitute for the other)—

Mr. DORSEY rose and said, he tendered to the honorable members of the House the expression of his thanks for their kindness, shown him on yesterday, by concurring in the motion for adjournment. If, said Mr. D. the forbearing course recommended by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] had been adopted, at an earlier day, I should not now have addressed this House. In the range which this debate has taken, there has been much said, which requires observation and refutation. It is too late, now, sir, to forbear discussing these exciting topics. But, without his most judicious advice to forego a spirit of crimination, I shall do so. It is in accordance with my settled purpose, never to add to an excitement leading us astray from what we owe to the dignity of this House, to the reputation of this nation, to our own self-respect. What I shall say will be of a vindictory character; it will breathe the spirit of justification, not that of implication. It is a source of congratulation that the gentleman from Kentucky has originated this inquiring resolution. As a citizen of this Republic, attached to its form of government, and its perpetuity, he is entitled to my thanks: for, sir, there is no resource upon which this government can, in time of great national danger and trial, rely with so much confidence, as on the attachment and affections of its citizens—these attachments and affections, so indispensable to its strength, can only be produced and strengthened by the settled conviction that its paternal care distributes the benefits and advantages of its institutions alike to all fitted by habits and education to participate in them. The nation, to submit with patience to the requisitions made on them for the support of the government, must be satisfied that those who administer the government administer it with a due regard to economy. The nation, attached to the simplicity of our republican manners, reprobates every departure from them, and marks with its reproach all those who seek to assimilate it in practice to the tinsel, the extravagance of royalty. As a member of that party which deems that the public interest and the preservation of our institutions require the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate, I thank him for bringing to the trial the imputed errors of the present National Executive. For, sir, it cannot be concealed, that, since the last Presidential election, imputations on the political purity of those who now administer the Government have been industriously propagated throughout the nation; that they have been received with eagerness; that the credulity of the American People has been imposed on by all the wily arts of party warfare; that the discontented and disappointed politicians of the day have labored to teach the People to look to the President and his Cabinet as usurpers of the elective rights of the People; as elevating themselves to power by bargain and intrigue; as aping the splendor of royal magnificence; as encouraging a lavish expenditure of public money, to reward political partizans; and employing the patronage of the Government to warp and corrupt the public sentiment, so as to ensure a continuance of the national power in their own hands. The honest and retired citizens of this country, who are only interested in the pure administration of the Government, and the continuation of its blessings, unacquainted with those dark and secret springs of action which gave life and strength to those weighty denunciations, have become alarmed, and tremble for the safety of this Republic.

These jealousies and distrusters have been here, sir, fostered and reiterated. My honorable colleague, at a very early day of the session, in his resolution directing an inquiry, assigned, as a ground for the investigation required by the resolution, that rumors of an improper application of the public money had spread among the People. The honorable member from Pennsylvania has denounced to the nation a particular act of intolerance in the Treasury Department—"the transfer of the contract for stationery for the Collector's Office of the Port of Philadelphia to the Editor of the Democratic Press;" and has submitted a resolution of unprecedented inquisitorial character, demanding not only copies of all the official, but of the Secretary's private correspondence, in relation to this substitution. This latter resolution, notwithstanding its unusual and reprehensible generality, as well as that of my honorable colleague, was sustained by the friends of the Administration. In unison with these previous inquiries directed by this House, I shall vote upon the present occasion. That resolution, or that amendment, which gives to the inquiry the greatest range of action, shall be my choice. Let our constituents be relieved from that torturing anxiety and suspense engendered in this political warfare for power, which now disquiets them as to the structure of our Government, the expenditures of the public money, and the political integrity of those who now administer our national affairs. They can only learn through the press the acts, the motives, and the policy of the Federal Government. Scattered throughout this vast continent, having but little intercourse with the Capital of this extensive Empire, feeling the pressure of the national authority but feebly, they can only learn the doings, the policy, and the motive of this Government, through the public journals. Our own experience, the experience of all free Governments, incontrovertibly prove, that this active agent for the dissemination of knowledge, in all times of high party excitement, partakes of that complexion which best serves the triumph of that party, of that chief, whose elevation to power it prefers; and that, in pursuit of this triumph, it misrepresents, it libels, it denounces, the policy, the acts, and the motives, of their political rivals. The freer the institutions of the Government are, the more active, the more criminating, the more vindictive, are these misrepresentations and these libels. This spirit of detraction and misrepresentation of men in power is coeval with our Government. The like imputations of corruption, prodigality, and assimilation of our republican institutions to monarchy, and expansion of the Executive power of the Government, were charged on those who administered it under Washington, the founder of this Empire, on Adams, on Jefferson, on Madison, on Monroe. They are the materiel of political warfare, and they have been hurled, at all times, and on all occasions, against those who are in, who administer the Government, by those who are out, but wish to burst open the doors of honor, of power, of wealth, for themselves.—Against this branch of this Government have those who labored for revolutions in the Administration, directed all the artillery of the press.

In a Government like ours, predicated on law, confidence must be reposed somewhere. Our Constitution reposes it in the Executive Department. From its analogy to monarchy, it is always an object of distrust and jealousy. It is presumed to affect the splendor of royalty; to stretch its prerogative; to extend its patronage to sustain its power; to lavish the resources of the nation, to reward its partizans. This jealousy, invigorated by our devotion to our republican simplicity, to a restricted executive prerogative, to the purity of our institutions, and hatred for a profuse expenditure of that money drawn from our labor, has been constantly invoked in every struggle for political power that has distracted the American People.

The first Administration of the illustrious Washington had not passed, before it was charged on his Administration that its policy was devoted to an assimilation of the practice of our Government to the most corrupting parts of the British Government; that the war debts of the Revolution were funded, and the public debt created, to bring strength to the usurpations plotted by the Federal Government on State rights; that the army, raised to check the savage incursions on the frontier settlements, was adopted in conformity with the policy of creating a standing army; that, having a funded debt and army, the piratical depredations of the Algerine corsairs were greedily seized on, as an apology for creating a navy; that the excise on whiskey was introduced to add to the support of the Government a swarm of officers; and that thus, a public debt, an army, a navy, the excise, the four prominent features and engines of the patronage, corruption, and expenser, of the British Government, were grafted on the American policy. The monarchical tendencies of these national measures, were not the only accusations made against this illustrious man. He was charged with affecting the splendor and folly of royal audiences; and the levees which were held at his house, to gratify the anxious and laudable curiosity of his countrymen, to see the great benefactor of the American People, were traced to a disposition, on his part, to imitate royal levees. He, too, was charged with an encroachment on the treaty-making power, and assuming that it came within his constitutional competency to give instructions to his Ministers abroad; to negotiate treaties with foreign Powers, without first submitting his instructions for the approbation of the Senate: he, too, was charged with drawing the public money for his own private purposes; and it was published, that the day on which he should retire "ought to be considered as a national jubilee; for, from that day, would the name of Washington cease to legalize corruption." And such, sir, was the acrimony of party spirit in his day, that there are now distinguished political characters, high in the confidence of this people, who have recorded upon the journals of this House, that their confidence in him was diminished.* These expressions of opinion were sustained by acts of national legislation, highly offensive to the feelings of that distinguished and unequalled man; as they were predicated on an avowed distrust of his patriotism and prudence. In 1797, although the Executive of the United States, by the Constitution, is entrusted with the command of the naval and military armament of this country, they denied to him the control of an armament, fitted out for the protection of American vessels, against the hostilities of the French marine, and restricted his discretion by legislative directions. Yes, sir, under these distracting rivalships for the succession, did distinguished statesmen embitter the peace, destroy the quiet, and lessen the confidence of the American People in that man, whose whole life was distinguished by his devotion to our Republican Institutions, by an ardent attachment for the happiness of that country which was elevated to the rank of an independent nation by his instrumentality; by that pure disinterestedness that never sought pecuniary gratification. Of Mr. Hamilton, that gallant soldier, who participated in the dangers of the battle with his beloved commander; that able and professed statesman who aided in the formation of the Constitution; whose writings allayed the hostilities against its adoption; whose investigating, powerful, and profound sagacity, established those great statistical principles which it is now political heresy to deny; whose political and private integrity is now eulogized by his former revilers; language was ransacked, vituperation exhausted, in portraying, in the most repulsive colors, his imputed political heresies and domestic errors. If such a President as Washington, and if such a Minister as Hamilton—and such a Ruler and such a Minister no other nation ever boasted—were charged with the most damnable political errors, I ask you, can such a President and such a Minister as we now have, expect to escape the foul libels engendered by this over-heated political atmosphere. Let the nation be satisfied that all who administer the affairs of this nation, are doomed, by the very genius of our Constitution, to be reproached by the revilings of their political enemies, and charged with anti-republican propensities; with a disposition to grasp power; with prodigality in the employment of the public money. The quiet and enquiring judgment of posterity has done justice to their memory; and the history of their persecutions affords to the present age an instructive monition against indulging in that credulity which tends to lessen the confidence which distinguished public services naturally inspire, and to teach us to examine into the secret motives of those who labor to withdraw the public confidence from the public functionaries.

The first Adams succeeded to the Presidency after an animated canvass. The French Directory demanded, as a preliminary to the reception of the American Plenipotentiaries sent to treat of peace, a douceur—"much silver." The despatches received from them, detailing these propositions, so degrading to our national sovereignty, were published. The indignant voice of the American People re-echoed throughout this continent: "millions for defence—not a cent for tribute." The Congress put on the armour of defence by laws providing for a provisional army; Washington was placed at the head of it; and the distinguished heroes of the Revolutionary war were again called to command. Yet this army, headed by these patriots, embodied to resist the humiliating demands of the Directory, were denounced as the instruments of power, designed to crush the spirit of inquiry, and to be directed against the liberties of the country. The influence of Washington on the public opinion had ceased: for he announced to the world that he cordially approved those measures of resistance. These denunciations produced, on the side of the friends of the Administration, a corresponding acerbity of feeling; and, as it most generally happens that * Mr. D here had reference to the proceedings in the House of Representatives, on the 15th day of December, 1795, upon an Address to President Washington, on his retirement from office, the last and pregnant paragraph of which was as follows:

"May you long enjoy that liberty which is so dear to you, and to which your name will ever be so dear: May your own virtues, and a Nation's prayers, obtain the happiest sunshine for the decline of your days, and the choicest of future blessings. For our country's sake—for the sake of Republican Liberty—it is our earnest wish that your example may be the guide of your successors; and thus, after being the ornament and safeguard of the present age, become the patrimony of our descendants."

Upon agreeing to this Address, the following gentlemen voted in the negative:

"Thomas Blount, Isaac Coles, Wm. B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, James Holland, Andrew Jackson, Edward Livingston, Matthew Locke, Wm. Lyman, Samuel Mcclay, Nath'l Macon, and Abr. Venable."

[AN. 30, 1828.]

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

in all conflicts of parties, much is done, which neither prudence or patriotism sanction, so, in this struggle, the measures adopted by the Administration to give strength and stability to their views, were the cause of the loss of public confidence. The Sedition and the Alien Law remain as historical beacons of the dangers, incidental to free Government, from the indulgence of political intolerance, and as illustrative of the violent and unconstitutional means which factions will invoke to prostrate their rivals: for these laws were sanctioned by those heads whose hearts and hands pre-eminently contributed to the establishment of our national independence. Yet, notwithstanding these laws, the authors of them now live in the grateful remembrance of this nation, for their political honesty. A grateful posterity, estimating their generous devotion to the cause of the country, forgive these errors of party collision.

Notwithstanding the great popularity which Mr. Jefferson acquired by the repeal of the war tax of the preceding Administration, and the prostrate condition of his political rivals, there soon sprung up men, who had contributed to elevate him to power, who denounced his Administration. He was charged with an undignified, impatience of attachment to France; with a hatred against England, that could only be satiated by her prostration at the feet of the French Eagles; with shaping his whole course of foreign policy with an eye to the gratification of these feelings of attachment and hatred. (We all recollect the celebrated saying imputed to a minister of his cabinet, when it sought to purchase from Spain the Floridas, "France wants money.") With a wasteful prodigality of the public money; for, sir, a gentleman, then of distinguished influence, the bitterest political enemy of the first Adams, as he now is of the second, the most zealous of those who toiled for the elevation of Mr. Jefferson, remarked, on the floor of this House: "Against the Administration of Mr. Adams, I, in common with many others, did, and do yet, entertain a sentiment of hostility, and have repeatedly cried out against it for extravagance and for profusion, and for waste, and wanton waste, of the public resources. I find, however upon consideration, whether from the nature of man, or from the nature of things, or from what ever cause, that that Administration, grossly extravagant as I then and still believe it to have been, if tried by the criterion of the succeeding one, was a pattern of retrenchment and economy. We have, sir, economised, until we have actually reduced the annual cost of a seaman from 472 dollars, as it was under the very wasteful expenditure of Mr. Adams' Administration, down to the moderate sum of 887 dollars." It was further said of him, that his restrictive policy, and the embargo, were recommended and adopted in aid of Bonaparte's continental policy to destroy the commercial resources, and thus prostrate the military and naval power of Great Britain—which alone presented a barrier to that universal conquest at which he aimed. That the great and leading measures of his domestic policy were to ensure the succession in the line of "safe precedents," and to elevate James the First to the Presidency. Yet, history has done ample justice to this illustrious statesman, while his errors, if any, and mortal remains, lie buried in one common grave—the recent funeral honors to his memory, throughout the nation, demonstrate the high estimation in which that statesman is held by his countrymen.

Mr. Madison succeeded in the "line of safe precedents." In those days of Southern influence it was deemed pre-requisite to the elevation to the Presidency, that the aspirant should have fitted himself for that high and arduous station by an intimate knowledge of our foreign relations and domestic policy. He was denounced, too, by many of his former friends, as deficient in energy, as sustaining the most extravagant doctrines of consolidation, as one who had forfeited his claim to public confidence, by recommending a dishonorable compact; with fraud and corruption; that his Administration was prodigal and wasteful; that he called to his armies men of bankrupt fortune and ruined reputation, and in which army, it was sarcastically asked, "what man of honor would accept a commission?" That he acted in concert with France, and waged a war against Protestants, against the bulwark of our religion; that he was unfitted to command; that he was too much of a philosopher; that he could not look with indifference on the shedding of human blood; that his measures, also, were directed to ensure the succession of James the Second in the line of safe precedents. Yet he lives, and now enjoys the confidence of all.

Mr. Monroe come into power by acclamation. His tour of observation through the North, his disposition to soothe the spirit of party rancor, was traced as springing from that vanity which is flattered by public pageantries—to a servile disposition to propitiate political enemies. From that moment, an opposition sprung up to his Administration; three of his "lieutenants took the field for the Empire, while he sat as an incubus on the Government." Each assailed the Department of his rival—the system of expenditures, connected with the fortifications and the army—the measures of the Treasury—were alike subject to the bitterest invective. The friends of the Treasury sought reform, and were dubbed Radical. The army candidate was denounced as a latitudinarian, and designing to surround the National Government with a splendor and power destructive of the reserved right of the States. And, Sir, this spirit of opposition being thus engendered, his Administration was pronounced weak and prodigal: and, even upon the floor of this House, he was charged with using public money for private purposes. The nation recollects with gratitude his devotion to the cause of his country, and sympathises with him in his losses, the inevitable accompaniment of every Southern man, whose care is abstracted from his domestic concerns.

These historical facts are brought into view to the end that the public may appreciate the motives which give currency to these clamors against those who administer the Government, and to shew that, at all times, and by all parties, the same charges which are now made against the Government, have been made, and are, instruments used for party triumph—corruption, prodigality, and a fondness of splendor, are the practiced weapons of the Opposition; they may influence sentiment for a time, but a spirit of free inquiry and correct information will banish these delusions, demonstrating the innocence of the accused, and the daring and selfish motives which produce the imputations. Recollect that these Presidents were the founders of the Republic, that they had an active agency in the establishment of your Constitution, that they lived and toiled for the Republic at home in the gaze of the American People; and above all, that they came into power by the majority of the votes of the American People; but even thus sustained, and thus elected, they escaped not the fell spirit of detraction. The present Chief Magistrate came not into power sustained by such powerful appeals to the confidence and affections of the American People. His life had been spent principally in the service of his country abroad, in watching its interests and its rights in foreign courts. When at home he presided over a Department, of none or very limited patronage, and which addresses itself only to the patriotism and intelligence of the People. He had three competitors, of distinguished reputation, and alike endeared to the country. A gentleman of splendid talents, the bold and undisguised advocate of those constitutional doctrines which enlarge the sphere of Federal action, retired from the struggle in consequence of the unexpected movements of a State, upon whose powerful support his calculations on success were predicated. No election was made in the primary colleges—and this House, exercising its constitutional contingent power, called the present incumbent to the Presidency. In forming his Cabinet, he called to the office of the Secretary of State, that distinguished citizen who now presides over that Department, and it is understood that he offered to another competitor, the office of Secretary of the Treasury.

From this moment, a spirit of opposition, detraction, and misrepresentation appeared. It was charged that the election was effected by "bargain, management, and intrigue;" and the nation has been convulsed by a more angry state of political hatred than it ever experienced before. History informs us, that, of all the parties or factions which divide a nation, those are the most angry, which are founded on personal considerations. The parties heretofore existing in this country had their origin in a difference of opinion among the People, as to our foreign and domestic policy. In sustaining or resisting that policy, the rival politicians addressed themselves to the reason and understanding of the nation. An unprecedented unanimity existed among us all, as to the great and fundamental policy which the prosperity of this country required to be pursued by its rulers. The present parties of this country are therefore formed upon the preference of one individual to another. In all our attempts, therefore, to proselyte, a review of their character and of their talents is taken. In this review much is said—much will be said—of an irritating and offensive character. These are the causes of our disunion.

We also know, that, of all the elections which agitated the Roman Republic, those were distinguished by the highest excitements and the greatest convulsions of the People, which sprung from the union (de coalitionibus) of the disappointed rival candidates, to prevent the reelection of their successful competitor. Whether there be such a combination now, the People must judge. I will not say that such a combination does exist, but I will say, that such a combination has been avowed and boasted of. During the last Winter, in the many speculations which were made upon the probable result of the next Presidential election, and sent from this place, with a view to animate the friends of General Jackson, there was one letter which pre-eminently attracted the notice of the public. Its style was good; the estimates of their then strength, and of their future hopes, were plausible. It was published in the newspapers of the opposition with high praise. The authorship was assigned to a then distinguished member of this House: its supposed parentage was traced, by traits of language, to the honorable member. In this letter, then so cheered, we find this undisguised avowal of the principles of cohesion, which give life and activity to the present contest. This letter says—"To the friends of Jackson and Crawford, those of John C. Calhoun are added; and the union forms such a force of number, talents, and influence, that it would seem improbable that this can be effectively met by Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay, and their friends, aided by their united experience, ability, patronage, and official advantages, great as they are. Men are so very sincere in their dislikes, that the most opposite natures will coalesce to diminish the power of an object of a higher common aversion, and will surrender the strongest personal competition to unite for mutual safety."

What a precious confession! If this be true, we cannot be deceived as to the character of that resistance to the present administration, which, like the Roman elections, governed by the same principles of mutual interest, threaten this People with the most angry political strife: not that the settled policy of this country shall be changed, but that the mutual interest of these distinguished individuals shall be subserved, and, by their gratification, encourage those future angry appeals to this nation by the disappointed candidates—rivalships which have destroyed every elective Government.

[Mr. BUCHANAN here inquired of Mr. D. if he said that he [Mr. BUCHANAN] was the writer of the letter? Mr. D. replied that he did not say so; but that he did not say that he, Mr. B., was not the author; that he had not mentioned the gentleman's name. Mr. B. rejoined: I am not the author.]

Mr. DORSEY resumed. Mr. Speaker, in addition to this imputation cast on the cabinet in its origin, which no gentleman on this floor has attempted to sustain, all its measures have been treated with the jealous coloring of disappointed ambition. A sombre picture of European distress has been drawn by the two gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. FLOYD.] The squalid bazaroni of London, Italy, and the starving population of Ireland, have been exhibited here to excite our sympathy—their wretchedness is traced to the madness, the weakness, and folly, of their ministry. Indeed, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOYD] was not satisfied with this affecting picture of general distress, but he tortured our sensibility by telling us that in London one human being died every day from sheer and absolute want; and these deaths were traced by him to the prodigality of the Government: and, in the same train of thought, and the same fervid glow of language, he told us of the distress of the agriculturist. He did not trace this to the measures of the Government, but, in tracing the causes of European distress, he did point to the ministry as the cause of the evil; and possibly he may have anticipated that these suggestions of his might influence men writhing under the agony of pecuniary distress, to become dissatisfied with the present ministry, under the delusive hope that in the change of public servants they might find relief. He knows that the mind of disappointment traces existing evils, no matter how remote or unconnected, to the great object of its displeasure. He knows that, in his own State, the destructive presence of the Hessian fly has been enumerated as one of the great evils which has resulted to this People from the elevation of the present Chief Magistrate. He has addressed himself to the easily excited passions of our nature; for, on this floor, while argument and reason can be called to our aid, will any gentleman be found bold enough to contend that the agricultural depression can be relieved by any act or policy of the National Government? The evil is in the redundant productions of the earth, and the state of universal peace. They are not satisfied, sir, with the attempt to alarm our interests, but they seek also to awaken our fears for the perpetuity of this republic. The gentleman from Tennessee, with a confident belief in the truth of his prediction, warns us, sir, that this republic is rapidly descending to the "ocean of corruption," and that, unless our steps shall be retraced, our duration as a nation cannot number twenty years more. Is it possible that this republic—the world's hope—shall fall by its present corruption within such a period? Such a prediction, too, must have its origin in a mind highly excited, and displeased with those who have excluded friends from office. I am justified in drawing this conclusion, from the examination of the imputed abuses of this Government.

It has been stated that the contingent expenses of this House shew a wasteful expenditure of the public money. They have been contrasted with those in the latter years of Mr. Adams' administration. Different, indeed, is now the condition of this country from what it was then. Independent of the general causes of legislation necessarily attendant on the expansion of our commerce and territory, there are particular causes which at the present period accumulate the expenses of this House. The war has left a number of claims unliquidated, and which can only be settled by the interposition of Congress. The Western lands are a fruitful source of legislation. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] says that the tables are weighed down with printed documents, not unfrequently interesting only to one individual. I did not suppose that a gentleman, just emerging from the "oven" of public opinion, would have ventured such sentiments. Shall not a citizen have his claim adjusted by this House? and, if he shall, must we not be instructed? and, if we must be instructed, in what manner can we be so well informed as by the printing of his petition? This doctrine is not in unison with the vaunted professions of devotion to the People, which these gentlemen are eternally echoing. Our per diem compensation requires reduction, and, sir, he elaborately so argued; yet, wonderful to relate, in his propositions, as originally offered, this retrenchment is not distinctly presented to the consideration of the committee to be charged with inquiring into the expediency of retrenchment. Yet he came instructed to press the policy of reducing the compensation—indeed, it would seem that other retrenchments engrossed more of the gentleman's attention than that of our compensation. I, sir, am decidedly opposed to it; the People are most generally satisfied that we shall have it; neither will I pay such a respect to any one quarter of this Union, excited by political controversy, where rival parties seek popularity by professions of economy and retrenchment, as to sacrifice to it the great public sentiments of the People. The gentleman from Pennsylvania advocates it—he lives in the enjoyment of "single blessedness"—it may suit him to serve upon a reduced compensation; although the sum we receive is not an equivalent for our loss, arising from the abstraction of our attention from private pursuits, yet it breaks, in some degree, the force of these losses.

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

It is objected that the number of clerks are too numerous. It may be so—yet do the gentlemen recollect that, during the session of Congress, the ordinary business of the Departments is suspended in the gratification of calls made on them for information sought for to guide legislation, or to act upon the public sentiment? Yes, not unfrequently are the Heads of the different Departments compelled to put into requisition every clerk to answer these calls within the time required.

The structure of our institutions is attacked, and the Military Academy is sought to be rendered an object of public jealousy, and the seeds of disunion, between the rich and the poor, between the plebeians and the patricians, is scattered, with more than Tribunitian industry. The West Point Academy, founded by Jefferson, is now described by his friends as an institution in its very principles aristocratic. The gentleman from Tennessee says that none but the children of the wealthy are educated there. It is not so; in its principles, it contains no exclusion graduated on rank. That there may be children of the wealthy educated there is true: and shall it not be so? Who contributes to it? Do not the wealthy? And shall they be excluded who do not contribute to it? But the children of the wealthy are not sent there from considerations of economy, but to prepare their children, by a previous course of study, to enter into the armies of their country: and it must be so, or the children of the wealthy will be excluded from the Army Register. This theory is confirmed by one single illustration. An honorable member of this House, who has expended thousands in giving to the poor the blessings of intellectual light, has now at that school a youth, who prefers to serve his country in her army. The gentleman has enumerated many instances, from his own State, in which the Representatives in Congress have had children educated there. If this be an abuse of the power and influence of the members, they are responsible to their constituents. The War Department must act upon recommendations. The constitutional implication that the members of Congress are deserving of confidence, must influence that Department, and the sin of the abuse of the discretionary choice must rest on their head. I can only say, that, so far as my experience goes, the selections in the part of the State from whence I come, has, in every instance, fallen upon those without parents and without property—except the son of a gallant General, whose blood moistened the field of Eutaw, and whose anxious wish is, that one of his descendants might, if a war should ever again return, display the same patriotism and the same daring as his father. A principle of distributive justice regulates the selection now, and I, with others, can say that the claims of the friendless and the poor are listened to with a sympathising heart, and a disposition to foster and protect those whose genius, it is presumed, fit them for military command. The general utility of this institution, till the power of a selection was exercised by a political rival, was admitted by all. If its abuses have weakened the public confidence in it, this Administration has not to answer for it; it commenced in other days, when the late Secretary of War was a candidate for the Presidency. But why deal in this general accusation? Bring forth a direct proposition to pull it down.

The general policy of the Government, commencing at its earliest period, as connected with its foreign intercourse, is now objected to by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLOYD.] He contends that we ought to retrace our steps, and recall all our resident Ministers; that, whenever measures of conflict shall arise, [between us and Foreign Governments, that, then, and only then, ought it to be the policy of this Government to send a Minister abroad, and as soon as the cause of the mission shall cease, that the Minister shall be withdrawn. Permit me to say, that this is another lamentable instance of the spirit of reprehension. That gentleman occupies too distinguished a station in this House, and too much space in the eye of this nation, to hazard his reputation in sustaining any specific proposition embracing such a doctrine. He had an opportunity, a few days since, when the appropriation bill was under discussion, to originate a question testing the soundness and wisdom of such a Chinese system. Yet, then, the gentleman was silent as the grave, and acquiesced in the appropriation authorizing the continuance of our diplomatic intercourse. The very measures then thus sanctioned by him are now enumerated among the prodigal and wasteful expenditures of our national resources, to enlarge the sphere of Executive patronage; and thus to create distrust in the minds of the People against the Government! This being once created, the transition is rapid to a feeling of hostility against those who administer it. Is it right, is it just, to sanction and adopt measures, and then to object these very measures as grounds of reprehension against political rivals? The wildest reformer could not seriously entertain such a scheme of non-intercourse with foreign nations. To cultivate kind and friendly relations with foreign nations is essential, indispensable, wherever our commerce expands. They produce feelings of mutual good will, and open new and interesting sources for the mutual exchange of productive labor. Hence it is, that all nations, and at all times, have deemed it expedient to have resident Ministers abroad. These general topics of invective and reprehension, applying alike to all former administrations, and now, for the first time, exhibited to the gaze of the American People, to assist in that revolution which is designed to elevate General Jackson to the Presidency, are followed up by particular specifications of improvidence and prodigality. The Panama mission, discussed, and re-discussed, is again brought in review. Upon this subject every thing has been said that can be said, and can be found in previous debates, directly on its adoption, and collaterally in vindication of the measures of the administration. I shall say no more of it.

It is objected to the Administration, that the Government entrusted a great and important negotiation with the cabinet at London, to Mr. Rufus King, once a profound and sagacious statesman, an able and practised diplomatist, and intimately acquainted with the subject-matter of the negotiation, from his long participation with the treaty-making power—when the vigor of his intellect was weakened, his memory impaired, and his profound penetration lessened, from advanced age. Is the fact so? Who tells you so? Did the Senate of the United States avow such an opinion? He had lived for years in daily intercourse with them, having constant opportunities of testing the retention of the powers of his intellect, his memory, and penetration; and they have afforded the most conclusive evidence contradicting this imputed unfitness for the mission—for, these very individuals approved his selection, without which he could not have been sent abroad. But, even concede that to be true, which is denied, and which is proved to be untrue, so far as the opinion of his brother Senators is entitled to consideration, can blame attach to the President for being uninformed as to the extent of his intellectual decay—if they, having greater opportunities of forming a correct estimate of his fitness for the duties entrusted to him, should have erred in appreciating his fitness for the station? Here again examination removes all grounds of accusation. But it is said, that his mission was unproductive. Why, concede that it be so. If the appointment was in its origin wise, and the Minister, from any cause within his control, failed to consummate his mission, upon what principle of humanity, upon what principle of justice, is the President reprehensible for the inattention of his Minister? He must delegate power somewhere—he cannot be present—it can only be required of him, that his selection should be judicious, and that, if the duties assigned are not wisely discharged, that his Minister should be reprehended. But, leaving these abstract theories of duty and responsibility, let us see what are the facts connected with this mission? Mr. King, in his passage, sickened; his health became impaired. When returning health enabled him to assume his duties, the British Ministry were scattered throughout the kingdom. The Cabinet of St James afterwards selected two gentlemen to enter into the negotiations with Mr. King, and communicated a wish that the American Government would also unite another Minister with their Minister resident. This proposition was sent to our Cabinet, and while the President was deliberating on the expediency of selecting Mr. Gallatin, admitted by all parties to be the first American Diplomatist, to be Minister extraordinary, and to unite with Mr. King to bring the negotiation to a fortunate conclusion, information was received here of the increasing ill health of Mr. King, and accompanied with a request that he might be permitted to return home. It was granted. He returned, and died in the bosom of that country, to whose benefit he had devoted his life.

Such is the history of this mission, arrested by a destiny uncontrollable by the cabinet; and such were the causes that led to the selection and temporary residence of Mr. Gallatin, who would not consent to a permanent residence at the Court of St James, but who was willing to give to his adopted country the benefit of that political sagacity for which he has been so pre-eminently distinguished, for a limited period. These particular and limited missions, are in accordance with the continued practice of the Government; they are adopted upon questions of great magnitude, and of long protracted diplomatic discussion. Washington sent Mr. Jay Minister Plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain, while Mr. Charles Pinckney was resident there. Mr. Adams sent Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry, to negotiate with the Executive Directory; they were not received. He again sent Davie, Ellsworth, and Murray. Upon receiving information that the Directory would negotiate, Mr. Jefferson sent Mr. Monroe to France, to treat, in conjunction with Mr. Livingston, on the acquisition of Louisiana. He sent Mr. Monroe to unite with Mr. Pinckney at the Court of Madrid; he sent Mr. Pinkney, of Maryland, to treat, with Mr. Monroe, at the Court of London. Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe's practice has been in unison with this policy. It springs from the expediency of calling into the public service distinguished individuals, who can only consent to give a portion of their time to the cause of their country, or to unite their wisdom in pursuit of great and interesting benefits for their country.

It is objected that the appropriation for Mr. John A. King was inconsistent with the law and the practice of the Government. This subject has been before us; the ablest refutation is found in the official reports which I shall read.

"The compensation received by the several persons so appointed, (with the exception of Mr. John A. Smith and Mr. Watts, whose accounts are not yet closed, but will be finally liquidated on the same principles,) may be seen in the above abstract from the Treasury. From that abstract it appears, 1st, that the allowance of salary in the character of Chargé, in the cases there stated, has been uniform; secondly, that the allowance of an outfit has been most usually, but not always, made; thirdly, that, in some instances, the temporary appointment has been continued after the intervention of the session of a Senate, as in the cases of Mr. Purviance, Mr. Russell, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Brent, Mr. Hughes, and Mr. Sheldon; and, in two cases, (those of Mr. Erving and Mr. Harris,) after the intervention of several sessions of the Senate; and fourthly, that, in the case of Mr. John A. King, the allowance made to him was a medium between the highest and lowest allowances that had been previously made. The highest was made in the case of Mr. Russell, and Mr. Jackson, to each of whom, besides the outfit and salary of Chargé, a quarter's return salary was allowed. Mr. King was not allowed salary as a Chargé, during the absence of Mr. Gallatin, on his visit to Paris last Fall; nor was he allowed a quarter's return salary as Chargé. He was moreover the bearer of a Convention, the first intelligence of the conclusion of which reached the Department by his delivery of the instrument itself. Such a service is always regarded, in the transactions of Governments, as one of peculiar interest. He might have been, but was not, allowed the usual compensation made to bearers of despatches. An extract from a letter addressed by the late Secretary of State to the Chairman of the committee of Ways and Means, marked B, accompanies this report."

But, independent of this settled practice of the Government, there is a legislative recognition of the practice upon which the expenditure to John A. King was made. It appears, the Committee of Ways and Means, in 1824, doubting on the expediency of allowing outfits to Chargé des Affaires, under similar circumstances with those of John A. King, addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, inquiring for information as to the practice of the Government. To this letter Mr. Adams replied as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 10th March, 1824.

"I have the honor of informing you, that outfits have usually been allowed to Secretaries of Legation, who have been left as Chargés des Affaires, on the return of Ministers Plenipotentiary to the United States, upon the termination of their missions.

They have not been allowed in cases of temporary absences of Ministers whether upon public concerns, or for their personal accommodation.

Retrenchment.

[H. OR R.]

Instances of the allowance, in the cases referred to by your letter, are of Mr. Henry Jackson, on the return of Mr. Crawford from Paris, in April, 1815, and Mr. J. A. Smith, on my return from London, in June, 1817; also, of Mr. C. Hughes, on the return of Mr. Russell from Sweden, in 1819, and of Mr. A. H. Everett, on the return of Mr. Kustis from the Netherlands, in 1819."

With this information, that Congress voted the appropriation, and thus sanctioned the Executive construction and practice. Could it be expected that Mr. Adams, when called to the Presidency, should disregard the practice of his predecessors, and its legislative sanction, by denying to John A. King, the admitted compensation received by his predecessors? Firm and independent as he always appears in the discharge of his official duties, he had not firmness enough to disregard the deliberate and consistent opinions of the two branches of the National Government.

We advance now to another accusation of favoritism, that is in relation to John H. Pleasants—that he was instructed to repair to Rio Janeiro and Buenos Ayres, with despatches to our Minister; that he received pay for such service, and that he did not go to his place of destination. I understand the facts connected with this bearer of despatches to be these: That he took shipping at a Northern port, that he, too, sickened, and, meeting a vessel at sea, bound to Liverpool, took his passage in her, as the most likely, and the only means of preserving his life. He gave his despatches to the captain of the vessel, who delivered them to the authorities to whom they were directed, and he transferred himself on board the English vessel, and received an equivalent only for his direct voyage. Would it not be well for honorable men to inquire and ascertain the truth of accusations before they indulge in a spirit of crimination? But, Graviores narrantur. Yes, sir, the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. FLOYD] who has for a long time occupied a seat here, whose statements and opinions are listened to at home and abroad with avidity, in the catalogue of the sins of the Government, has deliberately stated that the official dress of our Foreign Ministers has been paid for from the public coffers, and that a copper plate is preserved in the Department of State and furnished them, to shew the cut of their clothes!!!—another demonstration of the credulity with which every idle rumor is received. I undertake to say that there is not the slightest foundation for such statement.

[Mr. FLOYD here rose, and stated that he had been informed that such was the fact—that he had no intercourse with the Department.]

Mr. DORSEY remarked: The gentleman has the same intercourse that I have. As a Representative of the People, I have a right to ask information from every Department, and as I was astounded at such a statement, from such a source, I directed a letter of inquiry to ascertain if such was the practice, and received for answer that there was no such practice, no such expenditure. It is true that during the investigation of Mr. Monroe's claim in this House, it was stated that, in the contingent expenses of his mission (for which he received no outfit, and when he was not the Minister resident in France, that he was instructed by the Government to conciliate the good feelings of the Emperor, in reference to some great interest which was then depending between us and the Spanish Court) he charged the expenses of a Court dress in which Mrs. Monroe appeared at the Coronation. This charge was examined, criticised, and sanctioned, by the then Senate of the United States, under the Administration of Mr. Madison. This transaction is of other days—requiescat in pace. But a copperplate, yes, sir, a copperplate is "furnished to the Minister, to teach his tailor to cut his clothes, to make him look like a coachman—as his friend from Virginia said, like a livery servant." Ridicule may assail every thing; nothing is sacred from its shaft. This civil uniform, adopted by the republican Mr. Madison, to save the Ministers from heavy expenses, incidental to a frequent change of dresses, adapted to the costume of the Courts in which the Minister appears, is denounced as aping Royalty, degrading the appearance of the Minister, and inconsistent with the simplicity of our republican character. A gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] has said, that a bearer of despatches sailed in the very vessel which carried the Ministers, in charge of despatches to those very Ministers!!!—a charge, if true, that ought to sink and degrade the Secretary of State; but, if not true, the world will pronounce the accusation bold and reckless of the feelings and reputation of that distinguished individual. I here, upon this floor, upon authority obtained in my representative capacity, assert that no such occurrence has taken place. The long catalogue of Governmental and Ministerial errors is reviewed, save those of the private accounts of Mr. Adams, while abroad, and which were settled and sanctioned by the proper officers of the Government, before his elevation to the Chief Magistracy, and which are now dragged from the archives of the Treasury, to add to the political excitements of the day. These will be reviewed by others. Proud indeed ought the friends of this Government and of this Administration to be, when here, with all the appetite for censure, and all the materials to cull from, so little can be specified, and that little so easily refuted. Indeed, it is not to be wondered at, that they ask why we demand specifications? It is because specifications can be answered. Generalities infuse distrust, and are not susceptible of refutation. Innocence can be proved when charges assume a specific character. Innocence may fall a victim to doubts, to jealousies that are impalpable: One is the shield of conscious propriety, the other is the weapon of destruction, wielded by political rivals.

I now turn to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He says that he will not try here either the question of the purity of the election, or the wisdom of the measures of the present Administration; that the People are now trying them; that the great issue is made up, and that the spirit of inquiry pervades this land. It is all true; the issues are made up—one is, Did the present Chief Magistrate ascend into power by "bargain, intrigue, and management"? Is the Administration wise or provident? The other is—Is General Jackson's temper suited to the mild genius of our Government? Do his acquirements fit him for civil rule? Has he respected the Constitution of his country? And will not his elevation to the Presidency, effected only by the glare of military renown, be a precedent fraught with danger to the future liberties of this country? But, sir, interesting as these issues are, there are collateral issues of a character not less agonizing; one of them is—Has not a most foul plot been formed, to sacrifice the political reputation of distinguished individuals, whose names are entwined with every thing that is brilliant and profitable in the modern civil history of this People; to the end that disappointed political rivals may triumph? One other is—who are the authors of this plot, and does not the Hero of Orleans countenance it, by circulating cruel imputations on the political integrity of his triumphant rival? One other issue is—If there was management and intrigue resorted to to effect the election, were they not used by the now enemies of the Secretary of State, to enlist him under the banner of the sword? Here I will not say one word in support of these collateral issues. The excited feelings of the people are subsiding; the nation, restored by recent developments to its sobriety of thinking, will seek for information. I am willing to yield, for the government of the People, now charged with these issues, all the light and instruction that is within the control of this House; yea, even willing to take off injunctions of secrecy, and to unfold the secrets of the prison house, if there be any, shewing either the opinions of eminent men, as to constitutional law, or the means by which Indian treaties may be made. I am no advocate for economy in diffusing intelligence. The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us, that although the allowance to King, as Chargé des Affaires, may be in conformity to the practice of the Government, he would enquire whether considerations of ulterior political objects might not have conduced to it. He would try the quo animo with which it was done. I ask the gentleman in what moral or legal school his doctrine is to be found? An admitted legal act; an act done in conformity with a man's imperious duty; springing from the imperative obligations of the laws of society, to be questioned and tried in the forum of "intent"—"motive" the "quo animo." The motive of a legal act can never be questioned. The highest obligation of a citizen to society is obedience to the law. It is only when he acts in violation of the law, by doing that which the law prohibits, or omitting to do that which the law commands, and you are called to decide on his innocence or guilt, you enter into a consideration of the motives which led to the omission or commission, in order to ascertain his innocence or guilt. The "quo animo" with which he acts, then becomes great and controlling; but never till now did a legislator or judge attempt to inquire into the motives of a legal act. The settled principles which regulate public judgment, new theories, wild and cruel, are started, to try the present Administration by. The gentleman may soon see that, when you investigate the "quo animo" with which an act is done, what a door to malice, to uncharitableness, may be opened; even the gentleman himself may become a victim to his own doctrine—even he may be suspected of a want of fairness—of candor—of an attempt to impose on the public judgment. Yet all of us know, that, in the ardor of debate, the most self-possessed and practised debater may be guilty of omitting interesting parts of a quotation, which, if quoted, would present the meaning of the writer in a very different aspect from that in which it appears when torn from the omitted passage. Let us illustrate this by the gentleman's own argument. To sustain his imputation that Mr. Adams had called this Government a penurious Government, the gentleman read that part of the celebrated letter written by Mr. Adams to Levitt Harris, in which he says—

"Divided among ourselves, more in passions than interest, with half the nation sold by their prejudices and their ignorance to our enemy, with a feeble and penurious Government, with five frigates of a Navy, and scarcely five efficient regiments for an Army, how can it be expected that we should resist the mass of force which that gigantic Power has collected to crush us at a blow?"

And omits this clause—

"The ordinary horrors of war are mildness and mercy in comparison with what British vengeance and malice have denounced upon us. We must go through it all—I trust in God we shall rise in triumph over it all: but the first shock is the most terrible part of the process, and it is that which we are now enduring."

The letter, as read by him, contains a harsh censure upon his country, and a spirit of despondency. The whole contents of the letter, as read by me, deprecates the want of unanimity among the People, the inefficient armaments prepared for resistance, yet a confident belief in the virtue of his countrymen, and a conviction of ultimate victory. Here, this omission is an equivocal act; it may have been the result of accident or design. Here, the intent of the omission, the quo animo with which it was done, is a fair subject of inquiry, and I fear that, on this, conflicting opinions will be entertained here. But I understood the gentleman as saying, that it would have been liberal in Mr. Adams, at a time of great emergency, when the resources of the country were almost exhausted, during the late war, to have forborne pressing the claim for his outfit, which Congress had refused to sanction. This forbearance would have been patriotic, but certainly unexpected. Mr. Madison, unsolicited, gave it to him; upon the faith of it, his arrangements had been made at St. Petersburg. He was in a foreign country, at a period of war, when every thing was at the highest price. Yet, if he be liable to censure for insisting upon the retention of his right, and refusing to yield up a portion of the perquisites of his appointment to the common cause, let those only censure him who are innocent, and not liable to the same reprehension. If I mistake not, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was in Congress during that very year in which Mr. Adams received this outfit, and which he is censured for retaining. I have never heard that the gentleman from Pennsylvania gave up a portion of his per diem to the cause of his country! It is said of Sallust, that he employed his eloquence to paint the vices of these very crimes which he himself practised. Here again the gentleman's doctrine of quo animo will be resorted to; it will be inquired, if the intent of the honorable gentleman was to excite popular indignation against the Chief Magistrate, for omitting to give up a portion of his salary to his country; while he himself refused to practice such munificence?

The gentleman says, that the patronage of the Government has been wielded to sustain itself; that printers have been removed, and the editor of the Democratic Press, a "venal wretch," has been substituted for Mrs. Bailey, as the contractor for the public stationery, for the office of Collector of the port of Philadelphia. Why, concede that the Government does use its patronage in favor of its friends. Have not all parties done so; and does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania hold a prominent rank among the politicians of his own State, who advocate and practise the doctrine of exclusion against their rivals? Has he not approbated the improvement of the "condition of the press," introduced in the other branch of the Legislature, by the exclusion of its former printers, because they do not join in singing political Hosannas to the Military Hero? If I, advocating these doctrines of exclusion of political rivals from office, should denounce here my opponent, for pursuing the same course, my constituents would charge me with hypocrisy and dissimulation. They would inquire into the intent, the "quo animo" with which such denunciations were made; and, I feel confident, that they would trace it to an attempt, (abortive it would prove) to impose on their credulity, and to excite indignation against rivals, for adopting my own policy. But the editor of the Democratic Press is a venal wretch; it may be so, for aught I know. I know him not. I read his paper, and receive from it instruction and amusement. I have read, during the Summer, in that paper, some strictures on the honorable member from Pennsylvania—some editorial, and some on the responsible signature of Jonathan Roberts. That editor does write with a most keen pen; and his ink is sometimes tintured with much cayenne pepper, and not a little gall. I will not say to the honorable member, Hinc illic lacrymæ, but I ask the gentleman, is it either dignified or manly, to pour on the head of an absent rival—yes, sir, a literary rival—such terms of reproach? Sir, the gentleman says, he is the author of a base forgery. I presume he alludes to the letter professed to have been written by the unfortunate Harris to General Jackson, imploring mercy; and how does the gentleman know it to be a forgery? It appears that there was one written—received; but its contents have never been given to us by the distinguished individual to whom it was addressed. The published letter surely breathes such supplication, and embodies such arguments, as such a deplorable situation would naturally suggest. If he meant, in its publication, to convey the idea that such a letter might be written, there is no impropriety in it; if he gave it the positive character of authenticity, it is reprehensible. But whether it be a true copy of a letter written or not, it does exhibit a strong and powerful appeal for mercy; the letter, whether authentic or not, presents all the considerations that could be urged to stay the severe doom pronounced on the miserable Harris. These statements have had an influence on the public sentiment, unfavorable to the cause which the gentleman advocates. Such is the contradictory spirit of our nature, that we reprobate in others what we practice, and revile our enemies for their zeal in the cause to which they belong, while we toil to raise ourselves to the high eminence of distinguished partisans.

The inquiry made at the request of the other gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KARNER] has been this moment answered. The correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Collector of the Port of Philadelphia, has been given to us. It contains instructions, if Mr. Binns will furnish the stationery on as favorable terms to the public as others, to call on him for it. Sir, the Head of the Treasury Department, whatever may be his notions of State policy, has too much mildness of character, too much benevolence of feeling, to indulge in proscription. He is the very last man in this nation who ought to be censured by the friends of General Jackson. He has suffered them to remain in office; and, by the use of their patronage to embody all those who hold office under them, to turn him and his friends from office. They hold power by his sufferance, and that power they wield for his political destruction! Look, sir, at the Custom House of New York—presenting, if the public journals speak the truth, the warmest and the most active enemies of the Administration. Yet, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, knowing this forbearance, denounces the Department for intolerance. Again, the ‘intent’—the ‘quo animo’—with which this denunciation is made, returns. I fear that the People may trace it to a spirit which does not proclaim the whole truth, when the truth would be advantageous to political rivals. But the gentleman says, that a distinguished member of the Cabinet vaunted that the power and patronage of the Government would be used to corrupt and influence the public opinion. He makes this member of the Cabinet to say, “give us but patronage, and we will have power!” I am ignorant, if such a sentiment was ever avowed. In the paucity of the grounds of crimination against the Administration, I am not surprised at the avidity with which every newspaper rumour is embodied, and, in debate, given form and feature. I would protest against giving credit to every newspaper rumour. None of us could stand such an ordeal. Even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, notwithstanding his public services, might be weighed down by irresponsible rumors. But even conceding that the imputed boast be true, men do not proclaim their crimes on the house-top; aspiring Ministers, seeking their own elevation, do not avow that, to ensure their success, they will corrupt and destroy the Republic by an improper use of the patronage of the Government. The imputed language is equivocal. Here, again, we must resort to the intent—the quo animo—of the Speaker. Reason says, that, if he designed injury, he would not vaunt of it. Charity—says, that the sentiment intended to be conveyed, was, “give us but patronage, and we will so use it as to convince our People that it is used for the public good, and that, by thus satisfying them of the purity of our motives, we shall acquire power.” Political hatred will give another quo animo, no matter how repugnant to the uniform concealment which conspirators against their country seek, and say that the sentiment was an open avowal of that political corruption which was to be practised, to ensure a continuance in power.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has again denounced the Head of the State Department for tyranny towards his Clerks. He tells us that some of them disclosed Jno. A. King's accounts; that they were sent for, interrogated, and warned of the consequences which a repetition of similar disclosures would bring on their heads: that he had heard so, and that he believes it to be true. Be it true. This specification illustrates that, in the alembic of party, acts meritorious and praiseworthy are changed into accusations most foul. A clerk—a subordinate clerk—upon his own responsibility, without consulting the head of that Department, undertakes to give copies of an official paper, and this to the enemies of the head of that Department, for misrepresentation—as now proved—and this violation of official duty is justified, and he who did it is praised. I ask the gentleman, what right has a clerk to act without the direction or approbation of the chief of the Department? If he has a right thus to act in one case, he has a right to act in all cases: his discretion must be his rule of action. It would be degrading to the intelligence of you, sir, or of this House, to attempt to expose the folly of this imputation—weakest of the weak, and the most desperate of the desperate, enumerations which have been conjured up against the Cabinet; they alike serve to shew the bitterness of the attack and the impregnability of the Administration, where reason can be called to our aid. But, if such be the facts, and this clerk is permitted to enjoy his office—and that he is I have no doubt, for, if otherwise, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, intimately informed of the slightest movements of the Cabinet, as much so as a Parisian police officer could be, charged with the “espionage” of his Government, would have known it; and, if he did, we are sure that neither his charity nor patriotism would have concealed it—what a forbearing precedent does it establish. Will the gentleman and his friends, when the doors of honor and confidence shall be burst open to them, follow it? Others may believe that they will so act; I do not: for I understand they already avow, as one great attainment sought by the revolution in the public sentiment, is that of cleansing the “Augean stable.”

The gentleman says, “that the motives of human action are easily discernable—that ours may be traced; that the enemies of retrenchment always interpose the reduction of the per diem between the contemplated reform and the officers, and that thus, out of humanity to ourselves, we spare them.” Is it true that we have interposed the per diem? The mover of the resolution, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] have interposed the per diem, and advocated the reduction. The intent, the quo animo, with which they have so acted, it is not for me to decide. It is a question to be settled between those gentlemen and the gentleman from Pennsylvania; it is for them to vindicate their own motives, and to rid themselves of the charge of insincerity, imputed to the advocates of the per diem reduction. But I will say, that the motive—the quo animo of this imputation on us, is to exhibit us to the nation, as the advocates for the perpetuity of abuses, if any exist in the Government. This imputation, however, is negated by our course. But we are told this is not the accepted time for reform; that we must wait till General Jackson comes in. What, not the accepted time?—when we are told that the political body is charged with poison, and becoming so rapidly corrupt that it cannot survive twenty years; that the prosperity of our constituents is sinking under the errors of our Government; that all the sufferings and corruptions of the European world are thickening on us. And yet, sir, the authors of these painful anticipations tell us that this is not the accepted time. Let them beware lest the People shall doubt their sincerity or their patriotism, if they are actual believers in these forebodings of national evils and calamities. The dictates of patriotism require investigation. If they forbear to investigate, their sincerity may be doubted. We must wait for the annunciation of Gen. Jackson's triumph before we re-invigorate the Government, by removing the causes of its threatened decay. But suppose that annunciation shall never come, what is to be done. Are the abuses still to accumulate? Is it so certain that his elevation will come, that political doctors (as the gentleman from Kentucky has been styled by the gentleman from Virginia) shall not administer restoratives to the tottering political patient, unless he shall see and superintend the prescription, when, more especially, the imputed distemper requires immediately some wholesome curative? Indeed, we had learned that the "combinations for mutual interest" were nearly completed; but we did suppose that they were to be ratified by the People.

But, sir, it is said that "you cannot expect the present Heads of Bureaus to give you correct information; that you cannot expect, from our natures, that we will make developments restraining our patronage." Be it so—it is still no reason against an inquiry; the same officers will be continued under a new Administration, and then they will be influenced by the same lust of power or patronage, or they will be turned out, and successors appointed, who are to learn the duties of their office, and therefore not as capable of judging as the present incumbents, and liable to the same bias of love of patronage and power. But General Jackson may instruct them as to the requisite number of officers that ought to be retained. He would answer you, that, "retired at the Hermitage, it could not be expected that I could learn any thing of the dull routine of official business; it is impracticable for me to communicate any information; go to the officers appointed by me, and seek from them information." Thus delay will then give you incompetent officers, liable to the same influences which control the opinion of all men entrusted with power. Therefore, this is the accepted time. If you move not now in this inquiry, it will be said that you excite distrust by general denunciations, and when called upon to sustain them, you retire from the proffered, the courted investigation.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGHAM] gives a particular direction to the inquiry. He says he means not to "involve the principles and practice of the Government, yet it is important that the nation should know what sums have been paid from the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, usually denominated the secret service fund." It is important that the People should know how much of it has been drawn. The objects for which it may have been drawn, from the very genius of the Government, and the policy for creating the fund, can never be known. It originated under the first Administration of Washington, and has continued ever since. It is essential that it shall continue, in peace, as well as war. It is necessary to procure information in the time of peace, if peace is to be interrupted—in war, what are the contemplated movements of the enemy. All Governments sanction the procurement of information by the employment of spies. I recollect that, in another House of Legislation, a prominent statesman avowed that he had advised the present Secretary of War to use bribes with the Chiefs of an Indian tribe, to procure a ratification of a treaty, and that he sustained this advice by a recurrence to the settled policy of all Governments. The Secretary of War, however, could not be induced to adopt the policy recommended. But, independent of these considerations, affecting the peaceful relations of nations, there are commercial considerations, not unfrequently demanding accurate information for the Government, which can only be procured through secret avenues, opened by the Government's addressing itself to the interest of individuals. Hence Washington, as early as 1794, employed a portion of this fund; and his practice, I believe, has been followed by his successors. I unite with the gentleman, that the nation ought to know what sums have been drawn, and by whom, and before I sit down, I shall move an amendment, eliciting such information, and carrying the call back to the time of the creation of this fund.

The gentleman from Va. [Mr. RANDOLPH] says that "he will not contribute to inflate the canvass of the political ship, as long as an improvident Pilot remains at the helm. That with an eye directed to the next Presidential election, he will forbear doing any thing which may injure the cause of the People, and thus enable the present incumbents to remain in office." I know not his meaning of this metaphorical language. To me, however it does seem to imply, that no measure of great national interest will be sanctioned by him, lest it may give popularity to the Administration. This principle of resistance to measures of Presidential recommendation, has been attributed to the Opposition. Those prominent individuals, who attempt to marshal the public sentiment, are aware that the members of a Government become popular, as they contribute to the present or future interests of the nation, or as they add to its present or future glory. Hence it has been said, that the Opposition have sought to arrest all measures recommended by this Cabinet. To this cause, and to this cause only, can we trace the undisguised and consistent resistance of the Opposition to the great interests recommended for Legislative approbation. There is another cause of resistance. In all local divisions of party, there are timid men, who seek to side with the strongest party. To exhibit the Administration in Congress in a minority, will produce a moral influence over those vacillating politicians. It is, therefore, policy to wait a more favourable opportunity, for the coming of a more accepted time for the consummation of these great interests. If the moral of the honorable gentleman's metaphor is not misconceived, it is the first time that these doctrines, so destructive of the interest of this People, have been openly and publicly avowed. It is for the nation either to sanction or reprobate them. The first and direct fruits of such a policy, has been the immense loss which the nation has sustained in the refusal to change a portion of the public debt from a stock bearing 6 per cent. to one of 5 per cent. Yet these objectors to this transmutation, denounce the Government for a want of economy!! They, who have let a favoured few of the public creditors riot on the public revenue, invoke the indignation of the People against their rulers, for improvidence!! I hope, I do trust, that the attention of this People will now be directed to a correct estimate of the prudence of the rival parties. I, sir, am for this inquiry being directed to one committee. The reduction, to be satisfactory, must be graduated on some uniform principle—uniformity cannot be attained from various committees. I now move to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, by adding the following amendment:

"Resolved, That the said Committee [Ways and Means] be instructed to inquire into the expenditures which have been made since the 1st of July, 1790, from the several annual appropriations for the contingent expense of foreign intercourse, and which may be settled, at the Treasury, without specification of object: and also, the payments which have been made from the preceding period, from the appropriations annually made for the contingent expense of missions abroad, and which have been settled in the usual manner, according to law."

This was accepted by Mr. BLAKE as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE rose, and said, it had been so often repeated in this House, by those who had preceded him in debate, that it was not their intention to have engaged in the discussion of this resolution, at the time of its introduction, that, if he were now to declare his original disinclination to have said any thing upon the subject, he might claim something of sincerity, but nothing of novelty in the remark. The character of this debate, said Mr. W. considered in reference to the subject, is unprecedented. Upon a proposition of inquiry into the expediency of retrenching the expenditures of Government, if consistent with the public interest—an inquiry into the propriety and practicability of a more efficient application of the funds of the nation to the discharge of the public debt, we have permitted ourselves to be drawn into an angry discussion of the Presidential election. A discussion, embittered by party feeling, which can end in nothing but the extension of that breach which now divides the members of this House.

I have had the honor of a seat on this floor for some time. My own experience convinces me, and I think that of every member ought to convince him, that something useful in the business of retrenchment might be done. I confess, sir, the magnitude of the task has heretofore deterred me from moving the investigation. We all agree that there is, or may be a necessity for the exercise of this power, which alone belongs to Congress. But, "who shall bell the cat?" is the question. Undertake it who will, he will find himself surrounded by difficulties, and assailed by the leeches of the Treasury. But, sir gentlemen on the side of the Administration, upon this subject, have displayed a morbid sensibility. They exclaim, you have attacked the purity of the Administration! The character of the members of this Administration is assailed and we are willing that you shall push this investigation; we call upon you to specify your charges: we are willing to try the Administration. One gentleman, [Mr. DORSEY] in the confidence which belongs to him, of which I do not complain, exclaims, "we will throw open the doors of our prison house, and invite you to enter and investigate its secrets; and if the Administration be guilty, punish them—if innocent, let the world know it, that they may receive the reward due to their virtuous actions." Sir, I will do no such thing. I plead to the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

This Administration is now on its trial before the People. I will do nothing to deprive them of the exercise of that power, which of right belongs to them; nor do I wish to do any thing which shall prevent a fair, candid, and impartial decision. I will not change the issue, and stake the result upon the fate of an inquiry into the expediency of reducing the expenditures of this Government, or of correcting any abuses which may exist in the disbursement of the public money. There are more important questions involved in the contest, and I will tell the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DORSEY] that it is not a contest for men or money; it is a contest for principle, for liberty. It involves one of the dearest rights of this People. They have taken the subject into their own hands, and if this House would, they could not wrest it from them. It involves no less a matter, than an alleged disregard of their will by their agents, and it belongs to them to right themselves, if the injury has been inflicted. Tell me not, then, there is no principle involved. It is a contest who shall govern—the People or their agents. Nothing we can do in this House, upon the subject, will prevent a decision of this Presidential election by the People. We can't decide it. Mr. Speaker, we will not be trusted with its decision. Whatever I may say, which will have reference to the Presidential election, shall be in reply to remarks which have fallen from gentlemen in this debate, and I deeply regret that I feel myself compelled to do that much. I have not sought or provoked this discussion.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1828.

NEW TARIFF.

Mr. MALLARY, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred sundry memorials, petitions, and remonstrances, in relation to an increase of the Tariff of Duties on Imports, by way of protection to Home Manufactures, made a report in detail, containing the examinations made by the Committee, of persons under oath; and accompanied by "a bill in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports."

The bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. MARTIN, of S. C. stated that the Clerk employed by the Committee to take down the testimony was well acquainted with all the papers containing it, and more competent than any other person to arrange them. In taking the testimony, the order of subjects had not been observed—but each witness was examined on all the subjects on which he was called to answer, and then dismissed. This caused the testimony to be deficient in that orderly arrangement which was desirable; and he thought the information would be presented with greater clearness, if the testimony should be classified the testimony of all the witnesses on one subject being placed together and then that relating to another subject. The Clerk had been instructed by the Committee, and was prepared and fully competent to attend to the duty of such collocation. Mr. MARTIN concluded by moving that the testimony be printed under his superintendence.

Mr. TAYLOR objected to this motion, as it was not in order to alter any testimony once reported to the House by one of its Committees.

Mr. MARTIN asked if the gentleman could possibly suppose he wished to have the testimony altered?

Mr. TAYLOR disclaimed any such meaning—all he said referred to interfering with the order or arrangement of the testimony, as coming from the Committee to the House.

The motion was negatived; and it was ordered that 6000 copies be printed of the bill, report, and all the testimony.

MILITIA COURTS MARTIAL.

Mr. WICKLIFFE asked the consent of the House, before taken up the resolution of Mr. CHILTON, to permit a motion for disposing of the communication from the War Department, respecting the Six Militiamen—a motion for the printing of which communication had yesterday been laid upon the table.

Leave having been granted by the House,

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved that the communication and documents be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and be printed.

Mr. DORSEY wished him to state the reason of referring them to the committee on Military Affairs, and moved a division of the motion.

The motion having been divided, and the question being on the reference to the Military Committee,

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, that his conduct in relation to these papers had not only been made the subject of much newspaper comment, but had been greatly misrepresented in the correspondence of some of those Washington letter-writers, whose productions are sent abroad from this place unto every quarter of the United States. In some of these letters he had been represented as greatly dreading the publication of these documents; and even here he had been so far misunderstood (he did not say voluntarily) by the Reporters of two papers, (the Intelligencer and the Telegraph) that one of them had made him say, that the publication of these papers would be attended with injurious effects to the individual referred to, and the other had represented him to declare that "he dreaded the effect of it." Neither of these reports of his language was correct. He had, since yesterday, had an opportunity of examining the documents, and he could frankly state that, from the publication of them, neither Gen. Jackson nor his friends had any thing to fear.

Mr. BARTLETT expressed his opinion that a more appropriate reference of this communication would be, to send it to the Committee on the Militia.

The question being first put on the reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, it passed in the affirmative. The printing was then ordered, nem. con.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, together with the amendment of Mr. BLAKE.

Upon again taking the floor—

Mr. WICKLIFFE remarked: On yesterday [said he] I endeavored, in the remarks which I made, and which had been elicited by the course of the debate, and particularly by some of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DONNER] and by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE] to distinguish between the question pending before the House and the question depending before the people. I endeavored to direct the attention of the House to the nature of the inquiries proposed by the resolution; and, if possible, to abstract it from other topics which had been dragged into the discussion—with what effect or with what motive, it is not for me to say. One remark might not be unprofitable. On my way to this place, it was my good fortune to journey with a distinguished individual, a friend of the Administration, wending his way to the Seat of Government of a neighboring State, as a member of one of those Conventions which have of late fulminated their anathemas against the Military Chieftain. In the course of our conversation, this gentleman seemed to admit that the "signs of the times," as manifested by the ballot boxes, were adverse. He looked to the events of the present session of Congress with anxious hope that something would transpire, on the part of the friends of Jackson and Reform, which would produce a reaction in public opinion. I will not say that such a desire exists in any member who has participated in this debate. If a hope any where exists, that the friends of the one candidate or the other shall do wrong to the People, that advantage may arise to the cause of either candidate, I pray it may be disappointed. I have not courted this discussion, neither will I shrink from it. If those who differ from me in opinion think it incumbent on them to pronounce eulogies on the present Administration, I will not interfere with the discharge of their duty, or leaven the pleasure and satisfaction which they enjoy. But, sir, if they pursue the policy of skilful tacticians, and carry the war into the enemy's country, they must not complain if, seduced by their example, I do the same. How far it is consistent with the public interest to reduce the expenditures of Government; whether any of the offices might be abolished, or the salaries lessened; I am not, at this time, prepared to give an opinion satisfactory to myself. When the investigation takes place under the resolutions, we will have facts and data upon which to make up our judgments, and base our future legislation. If I am called upon now to form an opinion, compelled by the reiterated demands from the other side of the House, to specify the objects to which I would apply the pruning knife, I might do myself, as well as others, injustice.

I am not prepared to say, in the language of some gentlemen, that this is the most economical Government upon earth—that there is no necessity for retrenchments—that there have been no abuses in any Department. I think my colleague, who sits near me, [Mr. BUCKNER] did not fairly meet the views of the mover of these resolutions. It is true, that gentleman, when called upon to specify the offices which in his opinion might be abolished, among others, referred to one of the Auditors—he was understood to have designated the Fifth Auditor—an officer admitted to be burthened with duties. Is this the case with some others of the corps? But, says the gentleman, "to use a Western phrase, to take the scalp of an Auditor seemed to have been determined upon." Now, sir, if that be the case, and one has to lose his scalp, I do not know that a better selection could be made than that of the Fourth. If that officer can find time to discharge all the extra official duty which has of late been assigned him, and leisure to enlighten the public with essays in the newspapers, and in pamphlet form, such as have been ascribed to him, I think it very likely his official duties are not very onerous. Are gentlemen prepared to say there are no expenditures—I mean such as have the apparent sanction of Congress—which might not be reduced? Take the War Department for example. There is a single item in the expenditures in the accounts from one of the Bureaus—the Indian Bureau, it is called—for contingencies, $98,000. (I speak from recollection; a reference to the document on the Clerk's table will correct me if I am wrong.) What has been done with this money? Who has expended it? For what objects has it been used?—Are questions worthy of investigation. I have heard something of a Kickapoo Embassy during the past year. I have seen some of the fruits of this mission, in sweet, loving, and kindly speeches, made by the Minister to our red brethren of the forest. I believe the public would like to know what has swelled an item in the accounts to $5,000, about which we have lately read something in the newspapers. I should like to know the pay and emoluments of this Minister Plenipotentiary. Whether he received or was allowed an "outfit?" We have heard of some treaties made, and a failure to make others, all under the head of contingencies in the Indian Department. We must stop this practice of making Indian treaties, under an implied power to use the contingencies of the Department. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DONNER] in the course of his remarks, incidentally alluded to the Treaty of Washington, concluded by the Secretary of War, with the Creek Indians. There are some points on which I should like to be informed, connected with that transaction. By the original Treaty, the Creek Indians ceded all their lands within the limits of Georgia, and also relinquished their right to an immense territory in Alabama—for which the United States were to pay $400,000 in money. By the Treaty of Washington, we retroceded all the lands in the State of Alabama, and part of the lands in Georgia, and stipulate to pay an additional sum, in money, annuities, and expenses, of near $600,000. We are now called upon to appropriate more money, fifty or sixty thousand dollars, I believe, to purchase the lands within the limits of Georgia. This may all be right. I do not say that it is wrong; but, sir, I have been informed that important information was within the reach of the treaty-making power, in this case, as to the terms upon which these hostile Creeks, as they have been called, were instructed to treat with the United States—terms, I have understood, much more advantageous to the United States than those embraced by the treaty. I do not know the nature or extent of this information; nor do I believe Congress knew it when the treaty was ratified, and the money appropriated. It might not be unworthy our notice, if we pass this resolution, to look into another branch of the War Department. Not with a view to detect abuses—no, sir; in the branch alluded to, I believe justice is done the United States, according to law; and the remedy, if one is needed, belongs to the legislation of this House. It is a department whose principal duties are those of disbursing public money. The average amount of its disbursements is about $400,000—to do which it costs this Government upwards of $92,000. I do not charge this exclusively to the fault of this or any other Administration. By the legislation of the first session of last Congress, one thing I do know, that, upon the recommendation of the War Office, we passed a law, by which the expenses of this branch of the Department was greatly enhanced. I think this expenditure could undergo a little pruning, without injury to the public service.

On the subject of reducing the compensation to the members of Congress, I have but little to say. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to encroach upon your prerogatives, I would now propound the question to the members of this House. All who are serious in this business, hold up your right hands? [Here it was said by some one, in an under tone, that there was not a single hand up.] I view this [said Mr. WICKLIFFE] as all talk. Whether there have not been misconstructions, if not gross abuses, under the law fixing our compensation, might be worthy of investigation. Yes Sir, abuses I call them arising under our legislation, under the administration of a former presiding officer of this House, have taken place, and yet we are told they have not existed any where. I allude to the accounts of a former member of this House, as settled in 1823 and 1824. That gentleman's accounts had been settled for his services for several years. He claimed compensation for 1100 miles travelling. In 1823 and 1824, although the space between the city and his residence had not increased, yet, by the aid of "constructive journeys," the addition of 500 miles is made to the 1100, and he is paid by the then presiding officer of this House, for 1,600 miles, computing the distance by the river route, and is permitted to draw $1,800 as back rations, not before claimed. This may be a sound construction of the law. I do not believe that I would be justified in giving it this construction. Whether that construction will now prevail, depends upon you, Sir. At all events, I am willing that an inquiry shall be made upon the whole subject. If it is deemed expedient to lessen the compensation of the members of Congress, I will not be deterred from doing my duty on other subjects, for the little injury which it may inflict on me personally. I can vouch that coming to Congress has not been a money-making business with me. Upon the subject of the printing of this House, I do not complain. We have an immense quantity done, and it is well done. My colleague [Mr. BUCKNER] is correct when he says, that the time to check this abuse, if it be one, is when the motion for printing is made. We should then probably, expend as much upon the discussion of the motion, as the printing would cost the Government. We print more than we all read, and more than is useful. We have lately adopted the practice of printing extra copies for the benefit of home consumption. I allude particularly, now, sir, to those numerous splendid surveys of roads and canals, which answer the very valuable purpose for "looking glass papers," and play things for the children of our constituents at home. Printing of that description, and the Georgia primer, which has been so universally read by nobody, has cost this Government upwards of ten thousand dollars since the last session of Congress. If I were to descend into particulars, Sir, I should be much more tedious than the exhausted patience of this House would justify. I have been led into the detail, in obedience to the repeated calls from our opponents in this House.

The sound and economical administration of the affairs of this Government has been the theme of eulogium by every one who has addressed us on the other side of the House. How does this business stand, Sir? In turning our attention to past expenditures, and testing their propriety by their utility, I am inclined to the opinion, that, in some instances, we have not been governed by the "strictest economy." We paid, within little better than two years past, for dropping cards at London, about $56,000

Sending cards to Guatamala, about 20,000

For returning non est inventus, versus the Congress of Tacubaya, &c. about 40,000

By the report from the State Department, of last year, and what I have learned this year, the sum of $7,700, or thereabouts, has been paid out of the contingent fund to "persons other than clerks in the Departments," for services rendered. This sum will be found, on examination, greatly to exceed the expenditure of any previous year. Why is this? Have we not clerks enough to do the public business? Are they not competent? If this be the case, appoint others; but I claim the privilege, in behalf of the Congress of the United States, to create the office and fix the compensation. I discover, by reference to the estimates for the Department of State, a new source of patronage has been drawn within the vortex of this Administration. The amount is small, but, nevertheless, it may perform its office. I allude to the sum now annually expended for distributing the laws of Congress. Heretofore, the acts of Congress have been distributed by mail, without expense to the United States. Why this change? I do not know. I have not been informed. In casting my eye over the names of the individuals who have shared this portion of the patronage, I discovered the name of a gentleman who was charged, with what correctness I know not, with being the bearer of despatches from head quarters, relating to the election of a Senator of one of the United States. I adverted the other day to a circumstance upon the introduction of a resolution of inquiry to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I name it now to shew what perhaps will not be controverted, that that there does exist in the Executive Department of every Government, a disposition to enlarge its patronage and extend its power. Out of an appropriation of $30,000, at the last session of Congress, to improve the navigation of the Ohio river, when the Government had already two superintendents on that and the Mississippi river, under pay, skilful and vigilant men, the Administration manufactured a new office, with a salary of six dollars per day attached to it, and some gentleman in Pennsylvania, of high standing, (and I presume political influence) was appointed. He may be, for all I know, very competent—I know he cannot be more so than those already in the employment of the Government. What has been done I know not, except that the report from the Treasury Department informs us that 9000 dollars of the money has gone out of the Treasury. I have mentioned these things, Mr. Speaker, with a view of showing that my colleague had probable cause for the introduction of this inquiry. They may be all right, and susceptible of the fullest explanation.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STRAWNER] in the course of the remarks with which he favored the House, inquires very emphatically, "What have we done? The session is half gone, and we have passed but a single bill." This statement is to go forth to the public, that Congress have been idle and inattentive to its duties. I have an answer; if it were confined only to this House, it would be sufficient; and that is, we have had the pleasure of hearing this session, the second edition of the gentleman's views upon the interesting subject of the National debt, connected with the still more interesting one of Roads and Canals. But, sir, I have a more satisfactory answer for the public, and it is, that we have done much. Yes, sir, nearly twice as much as we did, in the same time, at the first session of the last Congress.

Retrenchment.

My colleague [Mr. CLARK] called the attention of the House, to what he was pleased to term the immense loss the nation sustained by the failure of the stock bill in the Senate, last year. What has this to do with the subject of retrenchment? Nothing. That bill, which proposed an exchange of six for five per cent. stock, failed, as many others do at every session, for the want of time to act upon it. How far it would have been successful, might be determined by the failure to make a similar exchange of six per cent. for four and a half per cent. The shortness of the period at which the new stock was made redeemable, did not invite the cupidity of stock-jobbers—of course, the loss to the nation is altogether uncertain. Its failure was unjustly charged, at the last session, to the "factious Opposition." I hope it is not wished to debit their account next Summer, with the same item.

My colleague [Mr. BUCKNER] does not more deeply deplore the course of crimination and recrimination which has marked this debate, than I do. With him I regret the introduction of any topic which is, in its connexion with the Presidential election, calculated to interrupt the ordinary course of public business. I might ask him, Who called forth the ghosts of the six militiamen? For what purpose were we troubled with that subject? Is there any member who wishes me to answer these questions?

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLORIN] and my colleague [Mr. BUCKNER] have introduced, in this debate, the dress which has been prescribed for our foreign Ministers. I do not notice it for any other purpose than to enter my unequalled dissent to the opinion expressed by the latter gentleman—that the dress prescribed is within the limits of republican simplicity. What is this truly republican dress? A coat, covered with lace, costing about 750 dollars; a cocked hat, and white feathers. Is this the emblem of our republican simplicity? It resembles more the miserable apings of royalty.

A motion was made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] to lay the resolution on the table. I do not think the reasons offered, or that gentleman himself, have been fairly treated, in his absence from this House, occasioned by sickness. It is not my purpose to vindicate him. He needs not my vindication. One gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] was pleased to present him to the American People to use his own language, as, "the leader of the Jackson party." After a night's laborious search for scraps and shreds of speeches, said to have been made by him, he has spread them before us in bold relief. Why is this done? Does the gentleman believe the American People are so credulous as to believe that the political opinions of any one man, however distinguished, which he may select, as at war with the feelings of the West, are the opinions of what he has been pleased to call the Jackson party? I protest against the gentleman's right to make up for Mr. Adams and Gen. Jackson an issue upon the correctness or incorrectness of the opinion of any other politician. Let me tell that gentleman, that the Jackson party, as he has been pleased to call it, has no leader. The People lead in his cause. They will no longer trust this all-important subject of choosing a Chief Magistrate in the keeping of your politicians. They feel as though they had been wronged, and they intend to right themselves. The member from Ohio has told us that the gentleman, [Mr. RANDOLPH] if this Administration falls, deserves more credit for its downfall than any other three men in the nation: and, sir, he has honored him with the title of Recruiting Sergeant of the Jackson party.

[Mr. VANCE rose to explain. He had confessed, Mr. V. said, that that was a hasty expression, and had taken it back as such, upon the call of the Speaker.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed: I recollect very well that the gentleman said he took back his words; that did not remove the impression which it was calculated to make here and elsewhere. But, sir, in the opinion of the gentleman, the member from Virginia is viewed, and has been viewed, by others who act in opposition, as mainly contributing to the downfall of the hopes of this Administration. This may account for the reason why such powerful efforts have been made, first, to destroy him physically, and next, politically. Of this I will say no more: He who has withstood the fire of the Commander-in-Chief, is in no danger from the light troops.

One more remark in answer to my colleague, [Mr. BUCKNER.] He did not, in so many words, say, but he meant to say, that, if ever General Jackson should be elected President, (which he most fervently prayed to God might never happen,) he did not wish to be here. He had made up his mind to retire. He did not wish to witness the long faces which would present themselves in this Hall. What is it that the gentleman so much dreads? I can assure him he will not find a worse pilot at the helm of State than we now have. I hope we shall not have worse times. If my friend's fears are of a personal character, and I do not think he can entertain such, I can only offer to him the same consolation which the Highlander gave the affrighted American prisoners, during the Revolutionary contest, when asked to tell them what would be their fate if the United States failed in the struggle. "I canna' tell ye man, his majesty is a merciful man, he will not hang lower down than Colonels, and a few atrocious characters." The questions of internal improvement and domestic manufactures have been alluded to by my colleague, and a prediction of their downfall is presented to our minds if ever Gen. Jackson shall be called to preside over the destinies of this Republic. Efforts have been made elsewhere to produce the impression that it is the object of Gen. Jackson, and all who support him, to destroy and break down the great interests of the country. This I pronounce a libel upon the whole course of his public life, and the opinions of his friends. It would be strange, indeed, if, among the numerous advocates for his election, there should not exist a difference of opinion upon the subjects alluded to. Are all who are found in the Administration ranks, of the true faith, according to the standard of the American system? The journals of Congress furnish us with the best evidences of the political opinions of the two candidates upon these questions, and to them I appeal. He who has maintained the honor and glory of his country in times of her greatest peril will not abandon her interests in times of peace. The same patriotism which gave life and energy and confidence to a few raw and undisciplined militia, and led them to victory and to glory, will direct the energies of this nation to the happiest results. The fate of these measures depends more upon the good sense and sound discretion of its advocates, in the halls of legislation, than upon the individual opinions of any Executive. I refer to the two last Administrations, I might say the three last. Were not the opinions, entertained by the two gentlemen who last presided over the destinies of this country, adverse to the exercise of the power of making roads and canals by the General Government, and hostile to the tariff? Yet the Representatives of the People, whose business it is to dispose of these questions at all times, pursued that course which sound policy, in their judgments, dictated. I will tell my colleague how these great interests may be destroyed—by too frequent legislation, by a partial legislation upon them. They may be endangered when demagogues seize upon them as a stalking horse to ride into power. My colleague, in a spirit of exultation, admonishes the gentleman from Virginia, that the Ancient Dominion is going for the Administration, and he will find himself in a minority in his own State. I entreat my friend not to lay that "flattering unction to his soul." If it should happen, what then? The Administration must, according to their own rule, change its policy.

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

From some examples already furnished us, this would not be difficult to do, if it were necessary to success.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE] told us "that the Administration party in this House had been proscribed." Proscribed by whom, sir? By the presiding officer of this House? O no, sir; the gentleman acquits you. Yet he will have it they are proscribed and unable to move. If any thing like proscription is known or felt by that gentleman, it must be a proscription by the People. The particular organization of the Committees of this House has caused the gentleman pain, and we have witnessed, in the fullness of his sufferings, the deep and lasting injury inflicted upon the nation, by an injudicious selection of your committees. His principal and melancholy affliction, is mainly occasioned by the selection of the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee, says the gentleman, furnishes evidence of personal, political, and sectional proscription. I use the remarks of the gentleman as near as I can remember them. A just tribute is paid by the gentleman to the head of the Judiciary Committee. That committee has undergone some few changes in its members, not for the worse I hope. His remarks, he tells us, are not personal toward the Speaker of this House. He admits the selection of the Chairman is such an one as he would have made; the gentleman must have some cause of complaint as to the other members of the committee. I am not disposed to complain, myself, of the gentleman's particular allusion to the members of that committee. I believe they are competent, and will discharge their duty. There have been some changes in all the committees, from what they were last year, and, among others, the gentleman himself has been reduced to the ranks. If it will console him, I promise, the first moment I can, to move, that he be made Chairman of the Military Committee by brevet rank. It may advance the public interest, which is committed to the charge of that committee.

The gentleman from Ohio has entered into the defence of Mr. Adams's votes, as Senator of the United States, upon the acquisition of Louisiana. It is difficult to perceive the connexion between this, and the subject under discussion. He has, however, disclosed to the American People, that which was not known to them before, when he tells us, "that Mr. Adams's opinions upon that subject, were the same as Mr. Jefferson's." He says they were mere constitutional scruples. I do not admit the correctness of the gentleman's premises or his conclusions. I will not enter upon the discussion of the constitutional power of the United States, to acquire territory and to govern it. Nor will I now stop to inquire, whether Mr. Adams might not have been influenced by other, and very different reasons, than those which have been assigned for him. One thing I will say, that he and Mr. Jefferson then entertained very different political opinions.

[Mr. BRENT rose, and requested that Mr. WICKLIFFE would give way, that he might correct a mistake, under which he, Mr. WICKLIFFE, in the opinion of Mr. BRENT, labored. Mr. WICKLIFFE yielded the floor.

Mr. BRENT observed, that he thanked the gentleman for yielding the floor, and affording him an opportunity to put him right in a matter-of-fact, which he was sure the gentleman had not intentionally stated incorrectly. It is a fact, said Mr. B. that Mr. Adams did vote for the acquisition of Louisiana; and he made a very able and very eloquent speech upon the subject, in the Senate of the United States. Mr. B. was about to continue his remarks, when Mr. WICKLIFFE rose and said, the gentleman must excuse him if he denied his right, on the present occasion, to wend a speech upon him.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed. I did not, said Mr. W., introduce this topic into the debate, nor am I much benefited by the information which the gentleman has given me. I confess it is news to me, and it will be news to the American People. In return, the gentleman will allow me to correct him in a matter-of-fact incorrectly stated by him, innocently I have no doubt. It is, that Mr. Adams did not vote for the acquisition of Louisiana. He had not taken his seat in the Senate when the treaty was ratified. The vote and speech alluded to by the gentleman, was upon the ordinary appropriation bill, providing, in part, the funds to pay the sum stipulated by the treaty. The political school to which Mr. Adams then belonged, held, if they do not now entertain the same opinion, that, after the President and Senate, the treaty-making power, had concluded a treaty, Congress was bound to vote the supplies. Mr. Adams voted against taking possession of the Territory. He voted against extending the laws of the United States over the Territory. Nevertheless, the Territory was taken into the possession of the United States, and our laws made to govern. What then ensued? A portion of our Western militia had been detailed, under the authority of the President, to take possession of the country. They rendered services under the orders of the President of the United States. After the services were rendered, Congress was applied to, to vote the money to pay them. Mr. Adams voted against the bill. Was there any constitutional objections to the passage of this bill? If this subject had not been forced upon me, I should not have touched it. The journals of the Senate will bear me out in all I have said. Yes, sir, and more.

The gentleman from Ohio has favored the House with a copious extract of a letter, written, or said to be written, by the member from Virginia, in which the name of Mr. Crawford is introduced. From the gentleman, Mr. Crawford has, on this occasion, as on former ones, received the tribute of respect justly due to his public and private virtues. The member from Ohio had Mr. Crawford prostrated, destroyed, physically and politically, by the unjust persecution of his enemies. Not only politically but mentally prostrated, says the gentleman. This imaginary destruction of the mind of Mr. Crawford, is perhaps inferred, by the gentleman from Ohio, from the fact, that this patriot and statesman has publicly avowed himself to be in favor of the election of the "Military Chieftain."

[Mr. VANCE desired to explain. He declared that such a thought was the most distant from his mind. He knew not the present opinions of that gentleman; nor did he know for whom he intended to vote. He had, indeed, heard something rumored upon that subject, but all reference to it was most distant from his mind when he addressed the House.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE continued. Who were engaged in the persecution of Mr. Crawford? I will not stop to inquire. I have by me the opinion of one individual, who thought then, and who thinks and acts now, with the member from Ohio, on the Presidential election, with which I will presently favor the gentleman. He will take it for as much as it is worth.

One other remark of the gentleman deserves a passing notice. He says neither of the parties claim for themselves to be the republican party exclusively. What particular name the gentleman shall please to designate his own party by, is no concernment of mine. It is not always that the character of a ship is determined by the colors which hang at the mast head; the best evidence will be her papers and crew, especially her captain. I will draw upon the gentleman's own friends, who act with him, for facts and evidences to determine the true character of the commander, and those on board. A gentleman* of high standing, late a Senator of the United States, a native citizen of Massachusetts, intimately and extensively acquainted with the political character of the Chief Magistrate, now his warm and zealous supporter, has given to the world his opinions upon the subject; hear him, in his own language. Of the elder Mr. Adams, he says:

"The old gentleman possessed very aristocratic feelings. He was in favor of taking all Executive power from the Senate, and vesting it in the President of the United States. The son was born and nurtured in these feelings, received his early impressions of men and things at the Courts of European monarchs, at an age when his mind and heart naturally conscious of high descent, were easily captivated with the splendor of royalty. He brought home these feelings, and he has carried them so far through life with him, he can't divest himself of them; and he appears awkward when he attempts it. He is naturally and habitually an aristocrat. Mr. Adams was the advocate of his father's alien and sedition laws, his direct taxes, his standing army in time of peace, his extravagant expenditures, his useless multiplication of officers, his sixteen midnight judges. He was the reviler of Jefferson, the father of the republican party, and of all his worthy and venerated compeers. He made a scandalous song about him, at a time when he was doing more for the Nation than any other man. He acted with the federal party, until he found, in the language of his father, that they were 'at the bottom of the hill.' The whole family, then, simultaneously, put round, or pretended to put round, and act with the republican party."

Again, he says of Mr. Adams:

"He has courted the federal party too much. His own friends and his father's friends are to be found among them. There is his first love, there are his warmest attachments. Rufus King heads the catalogue of his friends, and H. G. Otis, and other authors of the Hartford Convention, are on our list. The Editor of the Boston Centinel is made a printer of the Laws of the United States, by his influence, against the remonstrances of the republican members of Congress from Massachusetts."

"He has taken an important portion of the printing of the United States from the National Intelligencer, a paper which has the most extensive circulation of any one in the Union, because it supports Mr. Crawford for the Presidency, and has given it to the National Journal, of very limited circulation, because it supports him."

What says the same gentleman upon the subject of the persecution of Mr. Crawford, referred to by the gentleman from Ohio?

"He [Mr. Adams] has attempted to sustain the infamous ———, in his dastardly attack upon Mr. Crawford, in defiance of the moral sense of the People of this nation; and by some it is believed, that ——— was only the Punch of the puppet show, who spoke as he was prompted by the chief jugglers behind the scene."

Now, sir, let us, in order the better to determine the national character of this vessel, turn our attention to the crew. Here again I must draw to my aid the testimony of gentlemen on the same side, acting and co-operating with the gentleman from Ohio. Its competency or credibility will not be disputed. I extract it as the opinion of the Editor of the Salem (Mass.) Gazette, whose devotion and zeal in support of the re-election of Mr. Adams, none will question. To use a very common phrase, it is from high authority, and an undoubted source. I give you his words, when speaking of the Hartford Convention:

"It is believed [says the Gazette] that every member of that Convention, now living, is a friend to the re-election of Mr. Adams. At the time of his election, one of them (Hon. Mr. Longfellow) was a member of Congress, and gave his vote for Mr. Adams. The Hon. Mr. Olcott, another member, voted, in the New Hampshire Legislative Caucus, in favor of Mr. Adams: the Hon. Mr. Hall, another member, lately distinguished himself in the Vermont Legislature, in support of the Administration; and Mr. Hall and Mr. Goddard were chosen members of the Harrisburg Convention. If all the Hartford Convention men should withdraw their support from Mr. Adams, his re-election would be desperate. The country was in danger of being overrun by the enemy, till the Hartford Convention men came forward to its defence; and if the Hartford Convention men withhold their support, the cause of Mr. Adams is lost."

The Essex Register, a kindred print, says:

"We would sooner trust any member of the Hartford Convention in office, than Levi Woodbury, or Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire, and the three leading patriots of Maine, who are fulminating their anathemas against the Hartford Convention." * * *

Again:

"We ask the aid of no man who we are not willing to consider our equal, and on as fair ground as ourselves. * * * This yielding to the current prejudice, and raising the hue and cry against those whose aid we need, is miserable policy. The Hartford Conventionists are said to be in favor of Mr. Adams; and so are all the leading Federalists of New England, except some few who never forgive an offence."

I will not give utterance to my feelings, which the meeting of that Convention gave birth to. I never think of it but with horror. The leaders of that Convention cowered under the triumph of their country, and retired sickened at its glory. I rejoice that they are against us. It increases the confidence I have in the justice of our cause.

With one more remark, I shall take my leave of the gentleman from Ohio. He was pleased to anticipate as possible, what he seemed to, and I have no doubt does deprecate, the election of Andrew Jackson, as President of the United States: "Then," he exclaims, "we will have the glorious privilege of driving through the mud up to the hub, huzza! for the Southern policy. No roads, no canals, no tariff: the Richmond party, and General Jackson forever." I believe I quote the gentleman's own words. Let me say to him, that, should he and his party triumph, then, indeed may he exclaim: "we have triumphed over the spirit of the Constitution; by power and patronage we have made ourselves popular; we have converted a minority into a majority; huzza for 'light houses of the skies,' national universities; the Representative is no longer palsied by the will of his constituents—we have established the line of safe precedents."

This leads me, sir, to the reflection of past events, connected with the gentleman's effort to fix the charge of inconsistency upon others. I do not say that gentleman is obnoxious to the charge. I was impressed, forcibly impressed, with the sound political principles which were embodied in the address of a meeting of the friends of the Secretary of State, at Columbus, in Ohio, at which that gentleman [Mr. Vance] presided, and which has been presented to the world under the high sanction of his name. It connects itself with this subject. The House, I hope, will permit me to read a few passages from this document.

"Were Mr. Clay withdrawn, the result as to the election by Electors, would, most probably be the same; or, if it were not, it would place in the Presidential Chair one of the present Cabinet—an event, which it was the first object of the friends of Mr. Clay to prevent; not in reference to the men, but to the principle. Under the strong persuasion that the public good, and a due regard for a fair operation of the Republican maxim of 'rotation in office,' required that the next President should not be taken from the present Executive Cabinet, it was determined to support Mr. Clay for that office, as the person combining at least as many qualifications as any other that could be named, with the same prospect of success. It was hoped that those who had the same general object in view would have sacrificed personal considerations, and united in effecting that object. It was particularly hoped, that the Western country would have presented an undivided phalanx upon this great public question; and it is deeply regretted, that another candidate should be named and supported in the West, with the same object, and for the same purpose. But, while the advocates of Mr. Clay express this regret, they pretend not to question the integrity of motive, or purity of intention, which has produced this unfortunate state of things: nor can they forbear to indulge the belief, that the diversion will be much less extensive, and mischievous, than is by some supposed."

My interpretation of this language is, that the great object which the mutual friends of the Western candidates (yes, sir, and the object of the candidates too) had in view, was the breaking down this "line of safe precedents:" this almost certain succession from the State Department, and to elect from the great body of the People a Republican, who would come into office uncommitted to parties, untrammelled by bargains; who would administer this Government in the spirit and simplicity of its institutions. Whether the gentleman has changed his principles, what new lights beamed upon his understanding after his arrival at the Seat of Government in 1824, are questions which it becomes me not to answer. I may be allowed to express my regrets that the gentleman helped "to place in the Presidential chair one of the present [then] Cabinet, an event which it was the first object of the friends of Mr. Clay to prevent." I quote the gentleman's own language.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DORSEY] next demands a passing notice. That gentleman has, in the debate, distinguished himself by the zeal of his vindication of the immaculate purity of the men in power, and of their measures; and he has, in his accustomed brevity, undertaken specifically the vindication of the appointment of Mr. Rufus King; the payment of an outfit of $4,500 to John A. King, for coming home; the payment of $1,950 to John H. Pleasants, the Editor of the Richmond Whig, as pretended bearer of despatches from this Government to the Government of Buenos Ayres. Of each, in their order, I propose to say a few words. The appointment of Mr. Rufus King, I think, was an unfortunate one. The gentleman says he was taken sick. He forgot to tell us, however, that our Secretary omitted to furnish him with his instructions. Had he enjoyed good health, he was not authorized to act. So it was, he did nothing, returned home, and left his son, John A. King, in possession of the key of the bureau which contained the papers belonging to the legation, who remained in London without authority to do any thing until Mr. Gallatin arrived, a period of about sixty days. John A. King, for this service pro hac vice, is made Chargé des Affaires; and on his arrival the President paid him the sum of about $6,500 out of a fund appropriated by Congress for other purposes, which payment, I contend, and will prove, was in violation of the usage of this Government, and against the express provisions of the act of Congress of 1810. By the Constitution of the United States, "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." For the safety of our Treasury, and to guard against abuses, we make, annually, specific appropriations for specified purposes, and especially for the payment of salaries. We are compelled (to meet such contingencies as cannot well be anticipated) to appropriate a gross sum, which we denominate the contingent fund. Out of this fund I deny the power of the President to pay the salary of a Foreign Minister, or an outfit to a Chargé des Affaires for coming home. By the second section of the act of Congress, passed in 1810, as if with the view to prevent the payment of this sum to John A. King, (for the law is as explicit as the English language can make it,) it is provided, "that, to entitle any Chargé des Affaires to the compensation therein provided, he shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." By the first section of the act, the President may allow to a Chargé des Affaires, on going from the United States to any foreign country, an outfit—not on his coming to the United States from a foreign country. This act will be found in the fourth volume of the laws of the United States, page 309. The President, in no case, even under this law, is authorized to pay an outfit or an infit, unless Congress, by law, shall first appropriate the money. He may, by the appointment of a Chargé des Affaires, impose the obligation upon Congress to appropriate; but, until this is done, he is not justified in taking money appropriated for other purposes. John A. King never was appointed by the President. His appointment never was confirmed by the Senate. He came from a foreign country to the United States. In fact, he rendered no services as Chargé des Affaires; and, for about sixty days, while he had the possession of the diplomatic port folio, he is paid the sum of $6,500—a compensation at the rate of $39,000 per annum. And this is the act of the Administration which the gentleman from Maryland justifies, and says is in strict accordance with the practice of the Government, and the laws of the land. If so, Mr. Speaker, it is high time we should change the practice, and amend the law.

John Hampden Pleasants, the Editor of the Richmond Whig, most loud in the praises of this Administration, and the abuser of all who will not sing hosannas to the powers that be, has had his drag upon the Treasury of the United States, for valuable services never rendered. This case, of all others the least defensible and most reprehensible, has found an able advocate on this floor, in the person of the member from Maryland. Take the gentleman's own account of it, and what is it? That Mr. Pleasants was employed to bear despatches (whether newspapers or not is not stated) from this Government to that of Buenos Ayres. He sailed from New York, and, after he had got under way, he left his despatches in charge of the captain, took shipping and sailed for Europe, for his health; for he, too, it seems, (unfortunately for the Administration, says the gentleman,) was taken sick. I agree this is rather an unfortunate affair. He, however, went to Europe for his health. It is admitted he never went to Buenos Ayres. What became of the despatches—of what they consisted—we are left to conjecture. Mr. Pleasants, however, survives his severe indisposition, and returns to the United States, and the Secretary of State, with a knowledge that he had not been to Buenos Ayres, paid him, out of the public Treasury—yes, sir, out of this most convenient fund of "contingent expenses"—the sum of $1,950, for services which be never performed. I state the naked facts, and appeal to every member who hears me, to say, in his candor, can he justify this act?

The payment of the sum to King, it should be borne in mind, was while Congress was in session. Why was not application made to the Representatives of the People to appropriate this money? If it had been as much devoted as that Congress was to respond to the will of the Executive, I do not hazard much in saying that this amount never would have been drawn from the Treasury by a law of Congress. This business, by some means not known to me, became the subject of inquiry last winter. It seems that some of the clerks of the Department were suspected of having divulged or made it public. If I correctly understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, they were, one by one, summoned to account, and a threat fulminated against the one who had given any item of this affair. The member from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE] who seemed to speak on yesterday as one having authority, told us he was authorized to contradict this statement. I ask of him who authorized him? Will he condescend so far as to tell us? I should rather infer, from the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, that the gentleman's authority was not obtained from the fountain-head.

I understand the member from Maryland as impliedly admitting the truth of the statement. What, sir, has it come to this, that the officers of your Government, the Clerks of your Departments, dare not speak of the disbursements of the money of the People? If this be the case, it is high time for the Representatives of the People to apply the corrective. The member from Rhode Island made one other remark, which deserves notice. His words were, "That the patronage of this Government belongs to the party, and it ought to be used, and he hopes it will be used, to protect its friends"—yes, sir, to protect its friends. By the patronage of this Government is meant the money of the Government expended in the employment of suitable persons as agents or officers to do the public business; and I deny the right to use it for party purposes, for the protection of the friends of the party. When that shall be the primary object of any Administration, in the exercise of its patronage, we may not be surprised to see 1,950 dollars paid to a favorite Editor of a newspaper for services never rendered, and 6,500 dollars paid to a member of a powerful and influential family in a great State. The gentleman from Maryland says that, no sooner was the Administration organized, than the cry of "Bargain, intrigue, and management!" was heard from the ranks of the Opposition. These are not terms of my creation—I use not hard names. I look at things as they are, and form my own opinions, and act accordingly. Has not the gentleman done the Opposition, as he calls it, injustice, or rather his own friends injustice, in ascribing to the former the origin and the application of these hard names? Permit me to refer the gentleman to a document, in which he will find much useful political matter, and in which he will find used, as if in a spirit of prophecy, the very words referred to. It is the address of the State Committee of Kentucky, the friends of Mr. Clay, in the year 1824, who were zealously supporting the cause of that gentleman's election, most of whom, I believe, still adhere to him with a devotion I will not condemn. That committee, when invoking their fellow citizens to a united effort in the cause of their candidate, as necessary to prevent the election of President from devolving on Congress in 1824, close their labors with this patriotic and prophetic admonition to their fellow citizens: "Remember, that, after the choice of Electors once takes place, their voice will no more be heard in this contest. All will be carried by influence and intrigue, bargain and management. He who has the most extensive means of influence, and will promise the most favors, will have the prospect of success; and the nation will receive the President, not from the pure hands of the People, but from a club of political managers and intriguers." I hope in future the gentleman from Maryland will not rob his own friends of their just claims to political forecast, with a view of giving to his opponents credit for that they do not deserve.

The gentleman from Maryland has drawn to himself and his friends consolation, in the midst of all their difficulties, from the recollection of the fact, that the administration of Washington, of the elder Adams, of Jefferson, and of Mr. Madison, were opposed—ay, sir, and the gentleman leaves the public to draw the inference, that they, too, were opposed, by an "unprincipled faction." I wish I dare so far tax the patience of this House as to pursue the gentleman in this part of his remarks. I should like to dwell upon by-gone times, and to place to the proper account the events of those days. But I forbear. I will trust to other hands. Sir, I rejoice at the result of the opposition to the elder Adams; it was seconded by sound heads and pure hearts, and its results were auspicious. Democracy triumphed, and the national vessel was brought round on her Republican tack. I admit that the success of the Republicans, under the guidance of Mr. Jefferson, gave activity to his opponents, and the hope of success increased the bitterness of their gall. May I ask the gentleman where was the present Chief Magistrate in that contest? I might extend this inquiry. I will not do it. When the second election of Mr. Jefferson prostrated the political hopes of certain men, we soon heard of "summersets, of adhesions given in." That contest, like this, was one between liberty and power, between the aristocracy and the democracy of the country. This contest, like that, I trust, will triumph in the success of sound principles. But, sir, the gentleman complains that the administration of the great and the good Mr. Madison was opposed. Yes, sir, it was opposed—and by whom? I call upon the gentleman to name them.

This Government, in defence of its honor, its national character, if not its national existence, was compelled to make that appeal which is the last, the most to be deplored among nations. A war was declared; that done, political clamor should have subsided, and party spirit subdued itself in the love of country. Many, very many, who did not approve the measure, like patriots, bared their breasts to the steel of the enemy. There were others, yes, sir, others, who, in the heat of political excitement, lost sight of the glory and safety of their country. The calamities and misfortunes of war were said to result from a "weak and penurious Government." In certain portions of this Union, a spirit was abroad to oppose every measure of the Government by which the contest was to be brought to a result honorable to the country. In Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, the principle had been asserted, that the militia could not be called into the service of the United States for offensive war; that they were only bound to fight when our enemy invaded our territory; that they were not bound to obey the orders of any officer of the General Government, unless the President, in propria persona, took the field and directed their operations. In plain English, that they would not fight the battles of their country. Such was the state of feeling in Massachusetts, that the Legislature resolved "that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice in the victory of our arms."

I find by reference to the Journals of the Legislature of Maryland, that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DORSEY] introduced certain resolutions denouncing the administration of Mr. Madison in the boldest terms. Allow me to read from these resolutions a few extracts.

"Resolved, That the declaration of war against Great Britain, by a small majority of the Congress of the United States, was unwise and impolitic, and, if unsuccessful, the grand object contended for must be abandoned."

"Resolved, That the conduct of the Governors of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, respecting the quota of militia demanded from them, respectively, by the Secretary of War of the United States, was constitutional, and merits our decided approbation."

These were the sentiments of the gentleman, and here are the grounds of his opposition to the administration of Mr. Madison; and because that opposition was unwholesome, and at war with the best interests of an agonized country, the gentleman has very logically brought his mind to believe that there is nothing pure, but all is selfish, in the opposition to the present Administration.

[Mr. DORSEY here desired leave to explain.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE continued: Sir, I shall soon close my remarks, and then I will, with pleasure, hear the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I have referred to this resolution in no spirit of bad feeling; certainly none to his gallant and patriotic State; the valor and patriotism of whose brave militia gave us much to admire at the battle of Baltimore, much more than it gave the enemy to be proud of. When the citizens of that State saw danger, they left their political leaders, and met it, and repelled the advance of an invading enemy. These political dissensions gave confidence to our enemy—taking courage, as if invited to our embraces, he enveloped your Capitol in flames. The Hartford Convention were in secret conclave: your President was pronounced by a member on this floor [Mr. KIRK] as deserving a halter. In the West, sir, we were bleeding at every pore. It was a struggle who would do most for his country, who should offer up his life in defence of her liberties. Disaster, defeat, and massacre, attended our efforts on the Northwestern frontier, in the onset. Hordes of savages poured in upon the defenceless inhabitants of our Southern frontier. Our commercial emporium was threatened—our property and our women offered as the “booty and beauty” of an exasperated soldiery; gloom every where overspread our divided Commonwealth. At this period, we behold the much abused “Military Chieftain,” the plain farmer of Tennessee, impelled by the ardor of his patriotism, his devotion to his country, to offer himself as a willing sacrifice for the safety of that country. Wherever he goes victory crowns his efforts; he inspires confidence in all around him; he creates the means of war, as the emergency demands. In the love of country he lost sight of self; resolved to “conquer or perish in the last ditch.” Sir, I will not extend the contrast. I do not give to the mighty spirit who commanded, the entire credit. No, sir; the men under his command—men who did not stop to enquire about the boundary line of their country, who cared not who commanded them, so victory crowned their efforts, share with him my gratitude, and, I trust, the gratitude of their country. I have done. I shall vote for the resolutions of my colleague. I would prefer the subject should go to a Select Committee, who will go to work, and, in good faith, apply the legislative energies of this Government to the reduction of the public expenditures and the correction of existing abuses.

Mr. LETCHER said: I have witnessed this debate with more pain and regret than any that has ever occurred in this House since I have had the honor of a seat. One more unprofitable, more intolerant, and less likely to effect any good for the country, has never occurred here or elsewhere. Sir, as the Representatives of a free and enlightened community, disposed to maintain the dignity and utility of debate, upon correct principles, we should pause, seriously pause, before we determine to prosecute this further. Where, when, and how is it to be ended? What profit will be derived from it? What valuable object attained? Is our time justly, correctly, and fairly employed, in reference to the important interests of the country, to be thus exclusively occupied in this digressive, angry debate? If a debate it can, or ought, to be called. I had always, Sir, until brought to a different conclusion by the present discussion, been led to believe, that a debate was only necessary where a difference of opinion, in some shape or other, existed, and that its main object was to enlighten, to convince, or to persuade. Such, however, Sir, does not seem to be the character or design of this. Its object, or rather, perhaps, its tendency, is not to illustrate any particular proposition, or to convince us upon any matter of disputed policy. It is, if not for the nobler, at any rate for the obvious and gratifying purpose of abusing and censuring some of the most distinguished men of the country. There ought to be no discussion upon the resolutions as offered, because there is no disagreement of opinion among us as to the direction which they ought to take, and must take. Yet, Sir, without any disagreement whatever, as far as I know or believe, in reference to the subject-matter before us, we present ourselves before the nation in an attitude truly lamentably singular, to speak in no stronger terms. What is it? Why, sir, a subject is offered for the consideration of the House, in the usual mode of resolutions, inquiring into the manner in which the pecuniary concerns of the country are conducted by those to whom we have confided these high trusts; also, of enquiring into the propriety of lessening the number of our officers in service, of curtailing their salaries, and of reducing the pay of the members of this and the other House. To these resolutions every one almost, without exception, seems to yield a ready assent. Indeed, Sir, we appear to struggle severely with each other for the honor of most admiring them. We all profess to be willing, yes, anxious, to go into the inquiry, exceedingly anxious, yet, from some cause or other, we can't get into it. To profess to be willing to make an inquiry, is one thing—to make it, is another. Talking, and doing, are very different matters. If we are really and sincerely disposed to do any thing for the benefit of the country, upon this or any other subject, we must speak less, and do more. We should engage in the business of the country with the determination of doing it speedily, and going home. How, Sir, does it happen, that we can't get the question, and bring the debate to a close? The answer to this question will not, and cannot be denied. It arises from too much zeal, and too much sensibility, upon the Presidential question. Ah! That's the whole secret. The People understand all our movements; they are cool, deliberate, and intelligent, and will very quickly comprehend the design of an electioneering speech delivered in this House, whether it comes from the one side or the other. For my own part—I speak, however, with great deference to the opinion of others—I do not think it either complimentary to the members of this House, or to the People of this nation, to make the Representative Hall the arena of electioneering strife, and turmoil, and bustle. It should be exclusively appropriated to the legitimate purposes of legislation, and no other. The People will attend to the election of President themselves, if permitted to do so. They are the proper tribunal to make the decision between the two contending parties which now divide the country and this House. In their decision I have unlimited confidence. They will reflect coolly, and decide wisely, and that decision will be made, if not according to the wishes and feelings of all in this House, at any rate according to their own sober judgment, uninfluenced, I hope, by any and every attempt to excite them on the one side or the other. The truth is, Sir, and I speak my undisguised opinion when I say so, the importance and consequence which some gentlemen seem to attach to what they may say in this Hall, tending to bear upon the Presidential canvass, is very greatly overrated. It is a mistake, which results, like most other mistakes, from thinking too highly of their own speaking powers, and too little of the judgment and discrimination of those who send us here. Sir, we may declaim, and rave, and rant, and read newspaper squibs, and re-assert stale and long since refuted charges, and even descend to personal invectives against each other, or to personal violence, until we become exhausted and exhaust the Treasury too, without being able to infuse into the Public that degree of zeal which political calculating partisans feel, or in any material manner induce any portion of them to surrender their judgment to politicians struggling for power. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to discover around me, the most formidable preparations for a continuation of the debate. One gentleman is covering his table with books, another is taking notes, whilst about a dozen others are ready to avail themselves of the first opportunity of getting the floor. I did not rise with a view of saying any thing which would be the means of prolonging the discussion, but principally to express my earnest desire that the question may be brought to a conclusion. With the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] I desire to get the House rid of the question, by referring the resolutions to a committee. It is very easy to dispose of the matter, should we choose to do it. But one says, with great force and energy, I did not commence this discussion: another says, I did not. One party says, you began it: the other says, No, it was you. Who did begin it? Sir, nobody began it; yet it is here. Instead of disputing who commenced the discussion—for that fact, it seems, never can be ascertained—let us struggle who shall be the first to get clear of it, and at once proceed to the transaction of business. Why, sir, the scene is really ludicrous. It is more like children's play, if I may be allowed to say so, than the port of grave legislation. The original resolution, offered by my colleague, [Mr. CHILTON] was not of an unusual or extraordinary character. I was very glad when he introduced it. I little anticipated the irritation it has produced, or the length of time it has consumed. The inquiry proposed is a necessary one, and may prove useful to the country. In all Governments, there is a tendency, in a greater or less degree, to extravagance. It is incident to power and authority, whether that power be exercised by one or many—whether it be hereditary or delegated.

In a Government constituted as ours is, too much vigilance cannot exist upon the part of those in whom the People have placed confidence, in watching the public expenditures. I am not for making false clamors, or exciting the public without any just apprehensions, merely for my own purposes; but, upon principle, I am now, and always have been, in favor of observing a system of rigid economy and strict accountability in every Department of the Government. Frequent inquiries and examinations ought to take place. Honest, able, and faithful officers, such as I believe compose the Administration, have nothing to fear from the strictest scrutiny into all their official acts. On the contrary, it has a good effect. It satisfies the country, and it is particularly proper at this period, in reference to what has been said out of this House, for some time past. The inquiry, sir, is demanded by the People: they expect it, and are anxiously waiting to see how it will progress. Give it to us. Let the examination be thorough and complete. If one dollar has been applied improperly by the disbursing officers, ascertain the fact, and make it known. If nothing be wrong; if censures have gone abroad without any just cause; it would be but an act of sheer justice to those who have been implicated, as well as to the country, to say so, after this inquiry is completed. It requires no great intellectual effort to create suspicions, and to give them currency, whether they be directed against public or private character. So far as any thing has been said, in this debate, having for its object a design of casting any imputation upon the Administration, in its management of the moneyed concerns of the country, its friends now, and at all times, challenge the freest and fullest investigation; but, at the same time, protest against the right of their opponents of trying them under the doctrine of Revolutionary France, "of laboring under a suspicion of being suspected," and taking upon themselves the exclusive right of accusing and deciding. If any fact whatever exists, upon which to predicate a charge, even by implication, the accusing party have it completely in their power to expose it to the nation in glowing colors—the nation is fully competent to decide upon its merits.

But, sir, I am not about to pursue that course which I have taken the liberty so freely to condemn in others, by discussing the relative merits and demerits, fitness and unfitness, of the two distinguished candidates now before the People for the first office within their gift. No, sir. If my vanity even prompted me to suppose I was qualified for such a task, I would not, at this time, upon this occasion, in this House, allow myself, even under feelings of excitement, to engage in it. The topic, if persisted in, I fear, sir, will, in some degree, impair that dignity which has heretofore characterized the proceedings of this body. I have not taken the floor with a design of answering charges on the one side, or making them on the other. It was, sir, for a very different purpose, as I have already intimated. During this discussion, Mr. Speaker, which has taken a most extensive range, from what was said by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE] an impression was made upon the minds of some gentlemen, that his design was to impeach the purity and integrity of the presiding officer of the House, in his appointment of committees. Sir, I was very glad to hear that honorable gentleman frankly and voluntarily disclaim every idea of the sort. It would, sir, in my estimation, not only have been unkind, but unjust, to that officer, to have expressed or entertained a different sentiment. Though not elevated to that honorable station with my consent, I will take this occasion to say, without supposing my opinion is a matter of the slightest consequence to any one, as far as my feeble judgment extends, he presides over the deliberations of the House with ability and dignity. As to his appointment of committees, he has a right to select and organize them as he chooses—he and they being responsible to the country for doing harm, or for not doing good.

As to myself, I do not think, after two parties have been struggling for power, and one of them succeeds, it can reasonably be expected, that, in the distribution of the honorable stations in this House, the victorious party shall select their adversaries. This ought not to be required. If they look for the qualifications which fit individuals for those stations, and find such qualifications in men of their own party, it is natural, and right, that they should put those who possess them at the head of the leading committees. I should never object to such a course. If the party which has now the majority here, has placed its friends in stations where they can be useful to the country, while they do honor to themselves, I hope we who are of the minority, will never complain of it. If they have the honor, they have the responsibility too; and, I say, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, who has just taken his seat, and who has made some complaints against Mr. Adams about patronage, that I would go farther than merely protecting friends. Patronage ought to be distributed, in the first place, with a constant view to the public good. That object being kept in sight, the Administration has a right to look first to its friends—I mean its prudent, enlightened, and capable friends, and those who have done the most to place it in power, by giving support to fair and just principles. It ought to look next to friends, who, though not quite so zealous and efficient in its behalf, are equally faithful in their attachment to its principles and their country. In the next place, it ought to look to intelligent neutrals; still, as I said before, keeping its eye upon the public good, and upon suitable qualifications, and then, if there is any thing left, let them give it to open, but able and magnanimous adversaries. This I take to be a rule, right in itself, and one which has always more or less governed every Administration, but particularly Mr. Jefferson's. It is true, in aiming at this rule, an Administration may make great mistakes. They may sometimes select for important stations, men who bring no force to their cause, but then, this arises only from defect of judgment or information. They intend to strengthen their own party while they serve the country, and if they fail to do so, it is from the causes I mentioned. Sir, look to all Governments which ever existed. You never find one which gives all its favors to an enemy that would have prevented its success, and would, at any moment, prostrate it. The gentleman says this Administration has been very imprudent, and has committed great blunders in the distribution of its patronage. That may be, but I tell that gentleman, that, if his favorite candidate ever gets into power, he will most infallibly protect his friends, and to a greater extent than the present Administration has ever done. Sir, I believe this Administration has been a little culpable in this matter, although they have incurred the censure of the gentleman for a different course. I think they have not stuck to their friends quite as much as they ought to have done. No gentleman will suspect me of saying this with any personal reference. I never was an applicant for any office, and I never expect to be, and for a very good reason, sir. I never can succeed, if I should apply; there are too many ahead of me, of both parties, who excel me in zeal and ability, and anxiety to obtain office.

Sir, the motives of my colleague in introducing this resolution, have not been quite fairly dealt with. He has been charged with doing it for a mere electioneering purpose, and with wishing to throw a fire-brand into this House. I believe he had no such intention. I think I understood pretty well the quo animo with which it was introduced, (for, sir, I am really learning Latin very fast. I have heard so much of that language lately, that I am becoming quite a proficient; indeed, I am not without apprehension, that I shall, ere long, lose my native tongue. Why, sir, there are my two friends from Kentucky, [Mr. BUCKNER and Mr. WICKLIFFE] who I thought had never looked into a Latin book, and, to my great surprise, they have spoken whole pages.) I believe my colleague did it only to redeem a pledge given, under circumstances with which I am perfectly familiar. At our elections in the West, the People are accustomed to assemble, and to be addressed by the several candidates for their favor. In those addresses, their political sentiments are made known, and each strives to make himself and his opinions most acceptable to the People. Sir, in setting up their respective pretensions, pledges of reform and retrenchment are often made. The People are told of the existence of abuses which the candidate for their favor really sometimes himself believes to exist, but which, in truth, never did exist, except in imagination. Some excitement is of course the consequence of these repeated declarations of wrongs, and inquiries are generally excited on this topic. My friend and colleague, among others, partook of this excitement—whether he assisted to raise it, I know not. He, however, gave the promise to his constituents to introduce a resolution of this kind; and when he got to this House, he took no time to deliberate, or to consult his friends, but with all the ardor of youth, anxious to redeem his pledge, he had scarce been a week in his seat, before he rose, and proclaimed: I offer a resolution—I am pledged to my constituents—I am told there are abuses here, and I want to find them out. When he is asked, what abuses do you allude to? and in what Department do they exist? He very frankly answers, I don't know; but if there are any I want to find them. Sir, my colleague is very right; and if there are any, I want to help him to find them. As to the charge of his having thrown a fire-brand into the House, with a design to raise a conflagration, it certainly is not a just charge. A conflagration indeed has been raised, but how, sir? The two great parties militant seized upon his resolution—I don't know who first, but before we know why, or how, we are criminating and recriminating each other, and abusing the Administration, as if in a contest who could use the most intemperate expressions, and say the harshest and the bitterest things, and I must be permitted to own, that, in my opinion, my colleague upon my left [Mr. WICKLIFFE] is, in this respect, entitled to the premium. Sir, we may go on and abuse both the candidates as long as we please, but what will be the consequences? The People will look into it all—they will weigh us and our motives—they will say, such and such a gentleman spoke very warmly in Congress—he was under the influence of the feelings of a warm partisan. They will make the suitable allowances, and arrive at just conclusions, and that will be the end of it. But, sir, should the People ask us, as they certainly will, what we were doing in Congress this session? We can only answer, "We were making speeches." "Speeches! what about?" "Why, about an inquiry into abuses." "And why did not you made the inquiry? Oh, we had no time: all our time was taken up in speeches; there was not a single disagreement, we all said the inquiry ought to be made—but we could not make it for talking about it." Sir, it does forcibly and strikingly remind me of an anecdote I once heard, and which, if I may be pardoned for so much levity, (for I do not know whether this business is most serious or most farcical) I will relate. A certain lawyer had a farmer for his client, and when his cause came on, he made a very long speech in his behalf, without touching a point in the case. Coming out of court, he said to the farmer, "Did not I make a very syllogistical argument?" The farmer drily replied, "Why, as to the silly part of it, you certainly did: I do not know so much about the gistical." So, sir, depending upon it, the People will look at our arguments in this debate, and they will see most clearly "the silly part" of them. I know, sir, that many of the arguments have been very ingenious, and very edifying too, if we had but a subject before us. My object is to deal justly in the whole matter. I agree with the sentiments so well expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] and I think that that gentleman is entitled to the thanks of this nation for his modest admonition against prolonging this discussion, as well as its respect for his very brilliant display: and, although I could not agree in some of his conclusions, I may be permitted to say, that, whatever party may be up in this Government, I hope that gentleman may live long, and may, as I have no doubt he will, continue to enjoy the confidence of a free People. Any gentleman who, under such circumstances, could speak as that gentleman spoke, will always merit, and most certainly receive, the approbation and honor of his country.

Something was said by my colleague, [Mr. CHILTON] about the high rate of salaries in this city. I have no doubt that such is his honest opinion; but while, in our legislation, we vigilantly endeavor to promote economy, let us, at the same time, be not unmindful of justice. Let us endeavor to place the parties concerned on their proper ground. Gentlemen have said, "Look at the salaries of your officers!—$30! 1000! 1800 dollars a year! and some even higher?" Sir, my doctrine is economy, but I would not be unjust to the parties employed in the public service, nor would the People desire me to be so—they ought not to be abused without any cause. Sir, I know what is the doctrine of the people—it is precisely this: Be liberal and just, but not profuse. They are willing to pay to all those who serve the Government the full amount that their services are worth, and they are not disposed to pay more. I would give such salaries as will invite men of integrity and capacity into the public service: for that service will be more injured by employing ignorant or incompetent men, than ten times all the saving that could be effected: and, to speak my honest opinion, after long observation, quickened at first by not a little suspicion, I don't believe that we do pay too much to the clerks in the public employment. If, however, it shall appear, on inquiry, that there is one public servant who receives more than he ought to receive, let the evil be corrected. The inquiry can do no harm. A friend of mine from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] says, that the rule in Kentucky is to work from sun to sun, and if need be, a little in the night. Well, sir, these gentlemen labor from nine in the morning till three in the evening, and, when there is a press of business, they do more than that. They often do work till the going down of the sun, and sometimes far into the night. I say this because I know it to be true, and because I believe they are a collection of abused and persecuted men. Yes, sir, while they have faithfully served and labored for the public, they have been more abused than any class of men in the United States. Many of them are poor men, with large families. They are constantly occupied in the public service—they are accommodating in the extreme, and, after many years of assiduous labor, what have they made for their families. Sir, after they have paid for their house-rent, their fuel, and their provisions, they have little or nothing left. Why, sir, this place is not like Kentucky! (the finest and most favored spot upon the globe; with the best soil, the best water, the best climate, and, I will add, the best population—a little excitable, to be sure, but a people whose character has been misunderstood and misrepresented. There, living is cheap, and all things are plenty. A man who has one hundred dollars may live upon it a year or two years. How long does it last here? A man that makes it last a month, does very well indeed. Why, sir, bring a Kentuckian, and place him on a farm near this city, and though he was a fine, healthy, florid, rosy man, when he came here, compel him to remain on that farm, and, in a few years, he would pine away with the prospect before him. Sir, no man can live in this country. He can't exist in it, unless he has some hope and prospect of getting away. A region, though romantic and beautiful in appearance, that is without any soil, without any produce, without any commerce; a place that has to buy all it eats from Pennsylvania and from the upper part of Virginia, or from Nova Scotia—yes, sir, from Nova Scotia—for the very potatoes of this District come from Nova Scotia and Ireland!—Who would live in it that could get to Kentucky?—Now, sir, in reference to salaries, we must look at the expenses of living. I am no advocate for high salaries—very far from it. Eight hundred or a thousand dollars, in our country, sounds like a very large sum. A man who goes into Kentucky, with such a sum as that, can not only live upon it, but, with a little industry, can increase it. But the matter is totally different here, and I say this, because I know that the impression exists in the minds of many honest and well-meaning men, that there is great extravagance in the different Departments. They do not know, and therefore do not consider, the circumstances. If they did, that impression would be removed.

Retrenchment.

But, sir, there is the subject of our own pay, a subject truly delicate. I have no doubt in the world that my friend from Kentucky spoke feelingly, when he said that any reduction in our compensation was nothing but idle talk. I well know that he is not in favor of it. Oh no, sir! the medicine may do very well for others, but it will not answer for him at all. Now, sir, the gentleman who introduced the resolutions, and who, in this debate, has more than once been called "the Doctor," by his political friends, gives, at least, this pledge of his sincerity. He is willing to take a little of his own medicine, though not much; but as to my other friend from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] so far from being willing to reduce his salary to six dollars a day, I would venture any wager that he would not reduce it six cents below its present standard. Sir, the gentleman is a great friend of economy in the expenditures of Government, but he is like the doctor, who says, my medicine is excellent indeed—take a little of it—you don't know how much good it will do you: but when you ask him to take a little himself, he's off. Now, sir, I should like to see the gentleman willing to take a little himself; if it should be somewhat bitter, others might be more encouraged to make a trial, if they saw the gentleman swallow some before their eyes. One gentleman said he would take $5 a day, or $6, or he would serve for nothing. Sir, I am against that most decidedly. Another gentleman said he would take $4 a day. My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] was not willing to go quite as far. But a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGRAM] says that, whenever gentlemen in this House talk of diminishing the public expenditures, those who are opposed to it have this answer always ready: "begin with yourselves, begin with yourselves," and that it is a mere stave-off. Now, sir, who introduced this subject of the per diem allowance? It was my young friend the doctor. He introduced it, and, as it seems, without any consultation with older physicians, who appear not much pleased with the interference—at all events it is here. If, sir, my colleague remains here a little longer, he will find that there will not be so much left, at the end of the session, as he supposes, of that per diem. But, sir, reduce the compensation of members very low, and what will be the result? You throw the Government into the hands of the rich. Sir, there is a powerful struggle in every country, and always has been, between the wealthy and the poor; and, if you fix the compensation so low that the poor man must stand back, the plain result will be, that the rich man gets the ascendancy. The wealthy man cares not for money. No, sir; he wants the power. Nor does the poor man wish to come here for the money alone; but, because he is a poor man, he must have some compensation for coming. He wants, at any rate, a sufficient and a comfortable support, while he devotes that time, that otherwise would be given to his family, to endeavor to promote the public good. If you put the rate too low, the Government will be in the hands of the few, before many years roll round. All our laws would be made by the wealthy class. Now, sir, I am not for submitting my rights to rich men exclusively. I was reared in the humbler walks of life, and I have all the prejudices that belong so such an education. I confess to you, sir, that I hate, and always have hated, the influence of the proud and (as the gentleman from Tennessee says) the well-born. I would leave the choice in the hands of the People, and while I would not exclude the rich, I would not lay the People under a practical necessity of excluding poor men from this House. I want to confide my rights to one who knows how the poor man feels; to one who can sympathize with the laborer in his toil. Aye, sir, with the wood-cutter in his lowly cottage, and with that dependent family that surround his little fireside. When such a man is in Congress, he will be able to judge how any proposed measure will operate on all classes of the community, and he will keep constantly before him that great duty of every wise and good legislator, to avert, as far as it is possible, the pressure of Government from those who have to labor hard for a support. I am serious in these views, and it is my fixed belief, that, if you reduce the rate of a member's pay, you thereby endanger the rights of representation. If you reduce the amount of compensation, so as to oblige a man who accepts a seat here to encounter the prospect of ruin, be assured, sir, that, unless the country is in great extremities, however fitted for it, he will be under the absolute necessity of declining the public service.

Although, Mr. Speaker, as I have before said, I do not intend to discuss the Presidential topic upon this occasion, yet, I cannot forbear to notice the manner in which gentlemen have introduced charges against the Administration. My colleague [Mr. WICKLIFFE] said that he did not wish or intend to make any charges against the Administration. Oh, no! he charged them with nothing! So the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGRAM] told us, that no charges had been brought. But the gentlemen say, such and such a thing needs explanation, this was wasteful, that was extravagant, the other thing was contrary to law. But, all the while, they make no charges. Now, sir, I do not know what the motive may be, but I appeal to gentlemen's candor to say, whether there can be a more effectual way of destroying character than this? In private life, you may say of an individual, that he is a very clever man, he is very intelligent, very well informed, very agreeable, but, something has been said very much to his prejudice; yet you don't say it. Oh, no! Is not this a more effectual way of destroying the man, than if you made a charge, and let him defend himself? Yes, sir, you may destroy the most elevated character in all the country by this mode of attack. Sir, I should be sorry to believe the gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, had such a design. They tell us they make no charges, but—but what? Why, there has been great extravagance in the Diplomatic Corps, and in the Indian Department. And what is the answer? These charges have often been made, and as often refuted; but, if you believe the charge, make your call on the Departments, and let us see where the evil exists. Sir, who wishes to support a corrupt Administration? Who would do it, if he could? I, for one, will never do it. Then, let us use no more delay, but make the inquiry, and have an end of it.

Sir, I could be amused, if it were not for regret at the curious spectacle exhibited by this House. Here we are, in the midst of a violent debate: on one day, two gentlemen get up, and make a very strong argument about a horse. Next day, a gentleman rises in his place, and makes an eloquent speech about one John Binns. All manner of different topics are discussed. Here is my friend from Kentucky distressed, really quite grieved, about a coat. [Here Mr. WICKLIFFE said he had not introduced that subject.] No, sir, the gentleman did not introduce it: So it has been through the whole debate. One gentleman says, I did not introduce it; and another says, I did not introduce it. Sir, we cannot tell who did introduce it. Posterity must be ignorant of it. In the mean while, the resolution has been modified and re-modified, and modified anew. And what is the shape of it now? Sir, I do not believe that there are five gentlemen on the floor that know how it stands; and it scarce contains one of its original features. Let not gentlemen reflect on my colleague [Mr. CHILTON.] I think he has been very accommodating, very polite. When one gentleman says he should like to see it in this form, my colleague adopts this form. Another gentleman rises, and says he should think it would be better if it had that modification. My colleague immediately replies he will adopt that modification. I think, sir, he has shewn a most obliging disposition. In the mean while, all are anxious to get clear of it, yet now we are farther from it, than when we first began. Sir there was nothing so remarkable in my colleague's introducing this resolution. It is certainly not uncommon here for a new member to introduce a resolution, and to make a speech. The speech is made; the resolution is adopted or rejected; and that is generally the last of it. Sir, it is sometimes necessary to make a speech, if not to enlighten this House, at least for the benefit of home consumption—we all do it—and I, for one, am willing, that, when a new member feels inclined to be heard, and wishes to shew his great devotion to the cause of the country, we should suffer him to make his speech, and let the resolution go. But here, sir, we have speeches upon speeches.

In what I have said, sir, I would not be understood to have uttered what I do not feel. The disposition of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON] has been, I am sure, to see this debate ended; and, when I spoke of his indifference to the shape of his resolution, I meant to be understood that he was willing it should take any shape that would bring the debate to an end, and put a stop to this waste of time and money. Sir, I am for it. The resolution cannot assume any shape in which I will not be for it. I concur in the proposal of my colleague, for the appointment of a special committee, and I would have it composed of such gentlemen as understand money-matters well—your cent percent. men, who are acquainted with business, and know the value of a dollar. So much has been said about extravagance, that really, sir, the People ought to be well informed, in every particular—even down to pen-knives, wafers, &c., about which, allusion has been made by a gentleman over the way, who has thought fit to amuse himself a little at the expense of some of the Kentuckians. But I must make a civil request of him, that he will confine his venue to his own country. It is true, sir, there has been something in the prints about this subject, which occasioned some inquiry into the matter; but I can tell the gentleman, that the People of Kentucky are as little disposed to make a noise about a wafer or a goose-quill, as any People in the United States. I know them well: they are liberal—they are generous. But a statement has been reiterated in their ears, that there is a great abuse here, on the subject of stationery, and they went on this principle, and it is a sound one, that, if abuse does exist, if it be only to the value of a trifle, it ought to be corrected, because it is an abuse. It is not that they want to save a pitiful expense in pens, and wafers, and ink; they are disposed to see a member here furnished with all that is necessary and convenient for the discharge of his public duties, and to make no fuss about it. But they know that little improprieties sometimes lead to great evils. Sir, after saying a good deal against protracting this debate, I discover that I am myself falling into the error I have so much deprecated in others. I will desist with one or two words more. As a citizen and as a member of this House, I appeal to those in whom the People have reposed their highest confidence and particularly to the elder and more distinguished portion among us, for the preservation of the dignity and character of this House, and for the honor of the country, to aid and assist in bringing this discussion to a conclusion.

Mr. LIVINGSTON next addressed the House, as follows: I have never, sir, had the presumption to prescribe my opinions in this House, as a rule for the conduct of others, and have not offered them by way of counsel or advice, so often as, perhaps, my age and experience would have justified me in doing. But, I cannot, on this occasion, avoid expressing the regret, the mortification, the shame, that I feel, at the course this debate (if it may be called one) has taken. I refer to the conduct of no particular member; to no particular member's speech. But the whole course of the discussion, the criminations and recriminations which have characterised it; its desultory nature; the total departure from the object with which it was first introduced; the interchange of sarcasm instead of argument, and personalities instead of decorous debate; are such as cannot but sadden the mind of every member of this honorable body who has not suffered himself to be hurried away by the current of party feeling that has for some days past raged among us. And, if I judge rightly of the honorable feelings of those who have, will fill even them, with regret, when time has been given them for reflection. In the mean time, sir, what is the spectacle we present to the eyes of our constituents, and of the world? One, sir, that I should give offence were I to characterise it by the terms which it deserves. The warmth of debate—the recrimination which it sometimes produces, are evils, but unavoidable evils: they grow out of that free discussion which is necessary to the nature of our Government. It is not of these that I complain. It is the cause which has elicited these heats—the forgetfulness of what is due to ourselves, to the august body of which we are members, to the great duties we are delegated to perform, that has induced me to address you, in the hope of arresting this useless, undignified, and dangerous debate. We sir, each of us individually representing the interests of forty thousand of our fellow-citizens, collectively a co-ordinate branch of the Government, superior in power, equal at least, in dignity, to any other, having important duties to perform—we, sir, forgetful of our high functions, and of the dignity of the House to which we belong, have condescended to assume the livery of party, to arrange ourselves as the partizans of our equal, who is at the head of another branch of the Government, or of a private individual, who is a candidate for that place—to attach to ourselves, or to our opponents, the most degrading of all badges, that of being designated by their names. And here, sir, in the Sanctuary of Legislation, arranging ourselves into two parties, distinguished by a reference to the ensuing election, converting this Hall, destined for the convocation of the Legislative Representation of the People, into a hustings, where the one candidate is to be lauded, and the vilest trash of the vilest newspapers is to be repeated, to calumniate the other. I, for one, sir, will not consent to this. I am not a Jackson man; I am not an Adams man: (since I must repeat these undignified terms) I am a Representative of the People! And, proud of that title, will not vify it, by putting on any man's livery. As a citizen, I have my preference, which I have always avowed, and will never conceal. But here I was delegated for other and higher duties; and I consider it a question of much less importance, whether one or another individual shall perform the functions of another branch of the Government, than it is whether we shall perform our own with fidelity and dignity.

I pray gentlemen who may be inclined to continue this debate, to consider that we have already more than one hundred bills on the Orders of the Day; that these subjects for consideration are increasing daily by new reports. I pray them to reflect that all this is suffered to accumulate, while we are wasting our time, spending the treasures of the Nation, wearing out the patience of petitioners for our justice, disappointing the just expectations of our constituents, lessening our own dignity, injuring the character of the body to which we belong, and through it, that of our Republican institutions, in this useless war of words—and all, Sir, for what? Should we reciprocally succeed in destroying the characters of the only two men whom the People have thought worthy to point out as fit for the high office of their President, what shall we have gained? One of them must be chosen. Is it the interest of the losing party that he should come there loaded with obloquy and abuse? Will that render his Administration impartial, or make us united at home, or respected abroad? I put out of view any advantage arising from the resolutions should they be carried; that has been long lost sight of; they are scarcely ever alluded to. Indeed, to listen to the discussion, one would think that they had been already adopted; that the inquiry had been made, and had resulted in certain accusations against each of the candidates, which their respective accusers and advocates were endeavoring to enforce or repel. Thus, in the eagerness to charge and defend, have we reversed the usual mode of proceeding: and, if a professional expression may be pardoned, are trying the cause before the issue is joined. What, again, can either party hope for from this vast expense of time and money, of duty and reputation? What can they hope for? Admit the degrading idea, that we are the partizans of the two candidates, and that this is the arena in which the contest between them is to be carried on, what is to be the consequence? What, I repeat, can either party hope to obtain? Does any man expect that this war of mutual crimination, this unprofitable contest of trying which shall do the other the greatest harm, will do good to either? Depend upon it, not. No, sir, my earnest advice to my friends would be to remain silent. Not to reply to charges that must defeat themselves; not to make any which, if true, will be attributed to party spirit; to pass the resolutions, since they are before us, and reserve our denunciations against extravagance and abuses until facts are reported which may support them; to leave the Presidential Election to the People; as individuals belonging to that People, to exercise our rights, express our opinions, and give all the information we may possess to our fellow citizens out of this House, to enlighten them in their choice; but here to confine ourselves to the business which has been entrusted to us—make laws, correct abuses, impeach offenders. But, on a mere question of reference to a committee which (of whatever nature) usually passes without debate, let us place some limits to the scope of our remarks. Hitherto they have left no topic untouched, from the tariff to the humblest newspaper slander. Nothing has escaped the unusual press warrant that has brought every subject into the service. I could have wished, with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] whose sagacity foresaw the consequences of this motion, that it could have been laid on the table. Now it is too late; we must now pass the resolutions, wait for the report, and judge according to the evidence; we shall then assume our true character, and, if we must be partizans, the term will then imply no dishonor: for we shall be partizans, not of men, but of the truth. I entreat, then, in the name of the People, whose business is neglected, and whose passions, already too warm, will be further excited by this debate, that it may at length be brought to a close, and that the question may be suffered to be taken.

After a vain attempt to terminate the debate, by a resort to the previous question, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1828.

The resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, together with the amendment of Mr. BLAKE, (as proposed to be modified by Mr. DORSEY) being again under consideration—

Mr. EVERETT said, he begged leave to return his sincere thanks to the House for according to him the indulgence of an adjournment. At this stage of the discussion, (said Mr. E.) nothing but physical inability to proceed should have induced me to ask this indulgence. I will now endeavor to requite it, by the only means in my power: that is, by introducing no matter into the debate, which shall have a tendency to protract it. I took the liberty, yesterday, to observe, that, when a motion was made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] to lay the resolution on the table, I voted in the affirmative upon that question. I did so, thinking I foresaw the character of the debate which was likely to arise, if the resolution remained before the House. To a resolution for inquiry, of this nature, I could have no objection, except that of some little crudity in form, which has been objected to this resolution on every side of the House. With that exception, and could it have passed without debate, I should cheerfully have voted for it.

The House was not pleased to make that disposition of the resolution. The debate has been pursued; and the ground, in my judgment, has entirely shifted beneath our feet. It is not now an inquiry into the practicability of retrenchment, with a view to the more rapid payment of the public debt. I do not say that no allusion to this matter is left in the resolution; it may remain there in form; but, the substance is changed. The topic now put forward, is the expenditure of the contingent funds, particularly, that for foreign intercourse; and taking the debate as an indication of the character of the resolution, it is one of general crimination of the measures of the Administration.

I cannot, therefore, agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGRAM] that the subject-matter is not changed, but merely enlarged. About forms, I repeat, Sir, I will not contend; but I submit it to the judgment of the House, whether the substance has not undergone an entire change. Neither can I agree with him, that it is the friends of the Administration who have first given a partisan character to the debate. The gentleman has specified my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. BLAKE] as having been the first to give it this character. For two or three days, the discussion was not strongly of that description. The resolution, I believe, was first debated on Tuesday of the last week, and on Friday, for the first time, if I have correctly watched its progress, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLOYD] with a force and pungency almost peculiar to himself, introduced into his address to the House, a number of the topics of accusation, which have been most earnestly pressed against the Administration. When the gentleman from Indiana took the floor, he stated, (with perfect justice, as I thought,) that such had been the course of the gentleman from Virginia, and that he felt himself called on now to meet the question on that ground. I mention these things, not by way of complaint, but as matter of fact. Since then, the friends of the Administration have entered, but only on the defensive, into the debate—a debate, of a character, I freely confess, seriously to be deprecated; not because the friends of the Administration fear the strictest inquisition that can be made, but because it leads to waste of time; sacrifice of the public, and postponement of private interests.

I again beg leave to observe, that I am friendly to inquiry, in any and every form—I care not with what severity and strictness it be instituted. I know that all human establishments (especially so vast and complicated an establishment as that of a Government,) are liable to abuse. I am willing to admit, on these general principles, that there may be abuses in the Government as at present administered, although they are as likely to be abuses of restriction, as of extravagance; especially as the one generally leads to the other. Ill-timed and misplaced reduction often leads, in the end, to more lavish expenditure; and a judicious expenditure, (a memorable instance has been lately stated to this House in relation to the Post Office,) as often proves to be true economy. But, retrenchment is a popular theme, and the pruning knife has sometimes been so fully applied to our establishments, that their vital sap has flowed out of the wounds. Still, however, Sir, I would never oppose an inquiry into the abuses that may exist; and whether they be those of redundancy or deficiency, I am equally ready to apply the remedy.

Permit me to make one other general remark. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] in his liberal and eloquent address to the House, made a remark, which he justly offered as sound in itself, however paradoxical in its terms, that there were states of things, in which that which is naturally the health and strength of a People becomes a source of decline and decay. The gentleman applied this wise remark to a profuse expenditure of public money. There is another application of it, which seems to me to be equally just and pertinent. This branch of the Government—the Legislative branch—is, has been, and ever must be, the great centre of power in the Republic. It is the heart of the political system, out of which all life and power, as they have been imbibed from the People, must flow back, through the various channels of administration, to them. There are, however, other branches of the Government, which cannot be dispensed with for the public good, and these must be upheld, in their proper spheres and functions. Now, sir, if the tremendous power of this House be brought to bear unduly and disproportionately on other branches of the system; and especially if it be put into an extra-legislative action, (by which I mean an action wholly disconnected from its functions, either as a branch of the Legislature, or the grand inquest of the nation,) then, also, what is naturally our strength and safety, becomes a source of weakness, decay, and ruin.

I have already observed, that the prominent point of the inquiry, as now before the House, has become the foreign service of the country, and the expenditure of the funds appropriated for defraying its expense. The resolution puts forward that as the leading topic, and, in its very terms, (and this objection, I must confess, applies also to the amendment as modified) gives a character to the mode in which that part of the service has ever been administered, unwarranted by the Constitution, the law, and the usage under it. We are to enquire into the amount of the sums paid out of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, and settled at the Treasury without specification; and also into the amount paid out of the same fund, and settled at the Treasury, in the usual mode, according to law. So it seems that there are two kinds of settlements—one usual, and according to law; the other by specification, and impliedly neither usual nor legal.

This, Sir, is an important topic. The foreign service of the country is an exceedingly responsible branch of the public service. Unless we adopt the Chinese policy, we cannot but stand, in relations with foreign nations, highly important to the welfare and prosperity of the country. In peace, we stand in the relation of an extended and profitable commercial intercourse, depending upon its prosperity, to a good degree, on the character we sustain abroad. When peaceful relations give way to war, its duration depends not a little on the character with which we embark in it. The estimate which other nations form of our character, is affected by the manner in which we are represented abroad. The subject of our foreign intercourse is not, therefore, to be too lightly dealt with. It is one for which the Constitution and laws of the country have made peculiar provision—a provision, as I conceive, overlooked or misstated by the terms of the resolution.

By the Constitution of the United States, it is provided, that the President “shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other Public Ministers, and Consuls.” Over the exercise of this power, no control is given by the Constitution, to Congress: nor have they undertaken to exercise any other, than that of limiting the compensation to be allowed to such officers for their services, and the expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties. How, then, was this provision of the Constitution reduced to practice, in the original organization of the Government? In his speech at the opening of the second session of the first Congress, President Washington brought the subject before the two Houses, in the following terms:

“The interest of the United States requires that our intercourse with other nations should be facilitated: by such provisions as will enable me to fulfil my duty in that respect, in the manner in which circumstances may render most conducive to the public good; and to this end, that the compensations to be made to the persons who may be employed, should, according to the nature of their appointments, be defined by law; and a competent fund designated, for defraying the expenses incident to the conduct of our Foreign Affairs.”

With the subject thus presented to them, what did Congress do? Did they pass a law creating such and such missions? No, sir. Did they appropriate sums of money for such and such salaries and expenditures? No. The law passed is brief, and, bearing strongly on this and other matters of interest, I beg leave to cite it. It bears date first of July, 1790:

“Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is, authorized to draw from the Treasury of the United States, a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, annually, to be paid out of the moneys arising from the duties on imports and tonnage, for the support of such persons as he shall commission to serve the United States in foreign parts, and for the expenses incident to the business in which they may be employed. Provided, That, exclusive of an outfit, which shall, in no case, exceed the amount of one year's full salary to the Minister Plenipotentiary or Chargé des Affaires, to whom the same may be allowed, the President shall not allow to any Minister Plenipotentiary a greater sum than of the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum, as a compensation for all his personal services, and other expenses; nor a greater sum for the same, than four thousand five hundred dollars per annum to a Chargé des Affaires; nor a greater sum for the same, than one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars per annum to the Secretary of any Minister Plenipotentiary. And provided, also, That the President shall account, specifically, for all such expenditures of the said money, as, in his judgment, may be made public, and also for the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify, and cause a regular statement and account thereof to be laid before Congress, annually, and also lodged in the proper office of the Treasury Department.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the space of two years, and from thence, until the end of the next Session of Congress thereafter, and no longer."

There is one phrase in the law to which I invite the particular attention of the House, ("as he shall commission")—a phrase throwing light on questions not long since much agitated here and elsewhere. There were those, who took great alarm at the use of the expression to "commission," when employed by the President of the United States, to indicate one of the Executive functions in the appointment of a foreign Minister. They probably did not advert to the fact, that the President made use of no other language than that of the earliest legislation under the Constitution, and meant no more than the law meant, by the same expression.

The next law on the subject was passed 9th February, 1793. It continued the act of July, 1790, for another year, and thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and amended it to the following effect:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases where any sum or sums of money have issued, or shall hereafter issue, from the Treasury, for the purpose of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the same to be duly settled, annually, with the accounting officers of the Treasury, in the manner following, that is to say: by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, in all instances wherein the expenditure thereof may, in his judgment, be made public, and by making a certificate or certificates, or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate or certificates, of the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum or sums therein expressed to have been expended."

This is the first full enactment of the mode of settlement by certificate, or without specification, although the elements of the provision exist in the law of 1790.

By the law of March 20, 1794, the large sum of one million of dollars was appropriated, in addition to the annual forty thousand dollars, to defray any expenses which might be incurred, in relation to the intercourse between the United States and Foreign Nations; to be applied, under the direction of the President, who, if necessary, was authorized to borrow the money; and an account of the expenditure, as soon as might be, was to be laid before Congress. This large appropriation was designed to meet the expense of a treaty with Algiers.

Several similar acts were passed, at subsequent sessions of Congress, till, on the 10th of May, 1800, a law passed, giving to the legislation on this subject a somewhat modified form. This law is entitled "An act to ascertain the compensation of Public Ministers." It contains no appropriation. It re-enacts the former limitation upon the compensation of Ministers Plenipotentiary, Chargé des Affaires, and the Secretaries of Ministers: the second section directs, that, where any sum of money shall be drawn from the Treasury, under any law making appropriation for the contingent expenses of intercourse between the United States and Foreign Nations, the President shall cause the accounts to be settled by certificate, as prescribed by the act of 9th February, 1793; omitting the substitution of the Secretary of State for the President. This year, for the first time, the appropriations for the expenses of intercourse with Foreign Nations, were transferred to the act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1800. Besides several large specific items, fifty-two thousand dollars were appropriated, in addition to the annual forty thousand.

In May, 1810, an act was passed, fixing the compensation of Public Ministers, and of Consuls to the Barbary States. By this law, the compensation of a Minister, and Chargé des Affaires, was fixed as before; that of a Secretary of Legation, at two thousand dollars, &c.; and it was provided that it should be lawful for the President to allow to a Minister Plenipotentiary, or Chargé des Affaires, on going from the United States, to any Foreign Country, an outfit, which shall, in no case, exceed one year's full salary of such Minister or Chargé des Affaires; but no Consul shall be allowed an outfit, in any case whatever, any usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. The third section of this law was the same, verbatim, with the second of the law of 1800.

Up to this time, the appropriation acts had contained one item, viz: for the expenses of foreign intercourse. From 1810 to 1814, there were two items of appropriation, one for the expenses of foreign intercourse, and one for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The first of these sums was applied to pay the salaries of the Ministers, Chargé des Affaires, and Secretaries; the second was placed entirely at the discretion of the President, to discharge contingent expenses arising from the foreign intercourse, as he should think just and equitable.

In the general appropriation act of 1814, the item which, till then, had been expressed in general terms, for the expenses of foreign intercourse, was made more specific—"for the salaries, allowances, and contingent expenses, of Ministers to Foreign Nations, and of Secretaries of Legation;" after which was added the other item, for the contingent expenses of intercourse between the United States and Foreign Nations.

In April, 1818, the general appropriation bill contained one item for the salaries of Ministers at the several Foreign Courts, specified by name, and their several Secretaries of Legation; an item for two outfits of Ministers, to London and St. Petersburg; an item for the contingent expenses of all the missions; an item to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation of the preceding year; and the usual item for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. Similar specifications have been made in all the annual general appropriation bills, since that time.

From this view of the legislation of the subject, it appears that, originally, the whole fund for foreign intercourse, and, since 1814, the sums appropriated for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, have been placed entirely at the direction of the President. And, further, that a settlement, by certificate, without specification, is coeval with the Government, and in conformity both with usage and law.

I have been induced to make these statements, not merely for the sake of a better understanding of the point, in the resolution, on which it bears, but also in order to prepare the way for a satisfactory answer to some of the charges made against the President of the United States, relative to the accounts of his compensation and allowances, as a Foreign Minister. This is a subject on which I enter with some reluctance; it is not, perhaps, of the class which I should select to discuss on this floor. It does not belong, strictly, to this debate; but it has been introduced, on the present occasion, with strong emphasis; and to the effect, no doubt, of giving sanction to what is said more at large on the same topic elsewhere. This is an important point: for the allegations have extended not merely to a charge of extravagance, but of illegality, and even fraud.

High salaries are, I know, a popular subject of comment, and, as those of the Foreign Ministers are, with a single exception, the highest paid under the Government, it is natural that they should be obnoxious to complaint. But, sir, it is an undoubted truth, that, high as they may be thought, great as their aggregate may seem, for the service of a long series of years, they are yet too small; and, but for the extra allowance by which they are eked out, would be wholly inadequate to their object. It is not long since that a most respectable member of Congress, opposed to the Administration, expressed to me his concurrence in this opinion, and his willingness to join in raising them. I speak of the salaries of the three most expensive missions—to London, Paris, and St. Petersburg. It is a sufficient confirmation of the truth of this remark, that the compensation of Foreign Ministers is smaller, by one-fifth, than it was in the Revolutionary war. It was then fixed at two thousand five hundred pounds sterling, with an allowance of expenses. We are told, by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Florn] that he approved the Republican simplicity in which a Franklin and a Livingston lived, at the Court of France. Dr. Franklin's simplicity was kept up, for about eight years and a half, at an aggregate expense of one hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, (money being then twice as valuable as now,) and Chancellor Livingston, as I am informed, during his short residence at Paris, in addition to his allowance from the Government, sunk an estate of one hundred thousand dollars. I repeat it, sir, that, but for the extra allowances, it would be impossible for our Ministers, at the Courts I have named, to remain and support themselves; and the weight of necessary expenditure over the utmost allowance, has, to many of them, proved the cause of utter ruin. It is not necessary that I should specify the names of the living or of the dead.

Another remark, Mr. Speaker: The allowances to the President, be they great or small, were the acts of other Administrations—of the Administrations of Messrs Madison and Monroe. Mr. Adams had nothing to do in establishing the offices, fixing the compensation, or seeking the employment. For a third of a century passed in the public service, he never, neither himself, nor his friends for him, with his knowledge, nor without his knowledge, that I am aware of, solicited any office. The compensations and allowances to the Foreign Ministers were fixed by General Washington, under the limitations of acts of Congress, and were paid to Mr. Adams, as they had been paid to his predecessors.

Farther, sir, Mr. Adams had nothing to do with auditing his own accounts, or controlling the settlement of them; although this has been alleged, out of doors, and intimated, as I think, in this debate. The standing instructions to our foreign Ministers, require them, once a quarter, to make up and transmit an account to the Treasury. This was done by Mr. Adams; and in all his accounts there was but one item which the accounting officers of the Treasury declined settling themselves. That one item was referred to the President, by Mr. Adams, while Secretary of State; and, on legal advice, ordered by the President to be settled. To this I shall presently recur. With this exception, Mr. Adams had no more to do with the settlement of his accounts than you had, Mr. Speaker. He could have no more to do with it, if the officers of the Treasury were faithful to their trust.

I will add, sir, that, taking into consideration the number of years passed by Mr. Adams in the foreign service; the nature of his appointments; the variety and importance of the missions with which he has been entrusted, in whole or in part, no foreign Minister has received less than he; while many have received more. For the four years and eight months, commencing in 1812, when the first question of his accounts arises, and ending at his return, he received, in all, about $75,000. For a like term, Mr. Monroe received $83,000; for one year and eleven months, Mr. Pinkney received $41,000.

To place this matter in a clearer light, permit me, sir, to enter into some detail. In July, 1809, Mr. Adams received his appointment as Minister to Russia, with the usual salary and outfit, and repaired with his family, to St. Petersburg: a residence, I believe, as expensive as any in the world. No exception, as I understand, is taken to any thing in his accounts, till the commencement of the mission for the negotiation of peace under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. This mediation was offered in the Fall of 1812, through the agency of Mr. Adams; and I believe it is not too much to say, that it was mainly owing to the favorable impression of the American character conceived by the Emperor Alexander, during the mission of Mr. Adams, that the offer was made. This offer was accepted by the American Government, and, in April, 1813, a commission was sent to Mr. Adams, jointly, with Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, to negotiate the treaty with Great Britain, under the proffered mediation. The Secretary of State, under Mr. Madison, on informing him of his appointment, in conjunction with the other gentlemen, said, "as you will all be exposed to considerable expense, an outfit has been allowed to each." It may here be observed, that, in employing, as one of the three negotiators, the resident Minister at St. Petersburg, a saving of $9,000 accrued to the Government. The outfit alluded to was allowed and paid, at the time, to Mr. Adams.

Messrs. Bayard and Gallatin arrived at St. Petersburg in July, 1813. The Emperor was absent on the eventful campaign against the French; but the conferences of the Commissioners were opened with Count Romanzoff, Chancellor of the Empire. The expenses which the outfit was intended to cover, incident to the arrival of a new mission, actually accrued to a considerable extent, and were incurred the more freely by Mr. Adams, for the very reason that he had been allowed and paid an outfit for that purpose. England, however, it is well known, refused to accept the mediation of the Emperor, and the mission under it closed, by the departure of Messrs. Bayard and Gallatin, in January, 1814. Mr. Adams was then left as the resident Minister at St. Petersburg.

In refusing to negotiate under the mediation of Russia, Great Britain offered to treat directly with the United States, at Gottenburgh or London, and this offer was accepted. Mr. Adams was appointed, in joint commission with Messrs. Bayard, Clay, and Russell, to whom was afterwards added Mr. Gallatin, to negotiate for peace at Gottenburgh. Mr. A. received this commission at St. Petersburg, in April, 1814, with the instructions to repair to Gottenburgh. His commission as Minister to St. Petersburg still remained in force, and he was directed to leave Mr. L. Harris, as charged with the affairs of the Legation during his absence. Of his family, he had with him at that time, at St. Petersburg, his wife, in very ill health, and a son under seven years of age. In travelling from St. Petersburg to Gottenburgh, it was necessary to go by water passage, upon the Gulfs of Finland and Bothnia, or by crossing five passages, from ten to fifty miles in extent, over the islands of the latter of those Gulfs—which passages, at that season of the year, by the breaking up of the ice, were rendered impracticable, and were, at their first opening, extremely dangerous.

There was little expectation, in any quarter, that the negotiation would be successful; and there was every reason, on the part of Mr. Adams, to believe, that, after a short absence, he would be obliged to return to St. Petersburg. He therefore left his family and establishment there, which continued at nearly the same expense as before. Taking passage by water at Revel, in the first vessel which sailed, after the breaking up of the ice, and after repeated delay and detention, and great risk, from the same cause, Mr. Adams arrived at Stockholm on the 25th of May. He there learned that an arrangement had been made by Messrs. Bayard and Gallatin (who were in London) with the British Government, by which the seat of negotiation had been transferred from Gottenburgh to Ghent, in Flanders. An American sloop of war was then at Gottenburgh, having, as a cartel, conveyed Messrs. Clay and Russell to that place. It was ordered to the Texel, there to await the further direction of the American Ministers. Mr. Adams accordingly proceeded to Gottenburgh, embarked with Mr. Russell on board the vessel, landed from her at the Texel, and thence proceeded by land to Ghent, where he arrived on the 24th June. Six months from that day, on the 24th December, 1814, the Treaty of Peace was signed.

For this Mission to Gottenburgh and Ghent, Mr. A. never (as has been alleged) received either salary or outfit. And yet it was a mission different in its locality and the expenses incident to it, from that under the mediation. The outfit for the latter was not intended to cover, and could not cover, the extra expenses for the former. Accordingly, Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, each of whom had received an outfit and the expenses of their conveyance to St. Petersburg, on the mission of the mediation, were yet allowed all their travelling expenses from St. Petersburg to Ghent. On the same principle, and on the established precedents in the cases of Mr. Thomas Pinckney, in 1795, and Mr. Monroe, in 1805, who were allowed all the extra expenses of their Mission to Spain, while they retained their commissions and salaries as resident Plenipotentiaries in London, Mr. A. retaining his commission at St. Petersburg, was allowed, in addition to his salary as Minister there, the necessary expenses incident to the mission extraordinary to Gottenburgh and Ghent. The reasonableness of the allowance to them was never doubted. In Mr. Monroe's case, it received the direct sanction of Congress, not two years ago. It could not be more questionable in the case of Mr. Adams. Those gentlemen had to provide for their families in their absence: Mr. Adams was compelled to leave his at St. Petersburg, with a necessary continuance of almost all the expenses of his establishment. The extra expenses incurred were, therefore, fairly chargeable upon the extra service. The period during which this service continued, including the negotiation of a commercial convention with Great Britain, was fifteen months, from April 26, when Mr. A. left St. Petersburg, to 3d July. But the charges made by him, and allowed to him, were confined to the period from his departure from St. Petersburg to the time when his family joined him at Paris, about eleven months.

Mr. Adams had been informed by the Secretary of State, at the time he was appointed on the mission, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, that, in the event of the conclusion of peace, it was the intention of President Madison to nominate him as Minister to London. He accordingly repaired to Paris, and directed his family to join him there, with a view to receiving the order of the President either for his transfer, or his recall to America. They arrived at Paris, March 20, 1815. On the 7th of May, he received a letter from the Secretary of State, informing him of his appointment as Minister to London. This was in the midst of the period in France which has been called the Hundred Days; between the arrival of Napoleon from Elba and the battle of Waterloo. The ordinary communications between France and England were interrupted; and the passage of Mr. A. and his family to the latter country was attended with difficulty and delay. He arrived in London on the 15th of May, 1815, and the next day received his commission and Credential Letters to England, and letter of recall from Russia.

According to the rule adopted, as early as the Administration of General Washington, Mr. A. would have been authorized to consider his Mission as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Russian Government as terminating on the day on which he received his letter of recall. He might, also, on the same rule, have charged his extra expenses to the account of the joint commission for negotiating the commercial convention with Great Britain. He, however, considered his mission to St. Petersburg as terminating when the expenses incident to it terminated, viz: the arrival of his family at Paris, and regarded the special mission for negotiating a commercial convention as merged in that of Minister Plenipotentiary to England, for which he received a full outfit. Accordingly, from the 20th of March, 1815, he made no charge, and received no allowances for the expenses of a special mission. His colleagues received, for their part, in the service of negotiating the commercial convention of July 3, 1815, each a half outfit. Mr. A. has received no corresponding allowance.

In this way, the time for which Mr. Adams was allowed the necessary expenses of the special mission to Gottenburgh and Ghent, is reduced to between ten and eleven months—about the same space of time which was occupied by the special Mission to Spain of Mr. T. Pinckney, in 1795, and Mr. Monroe, in 1804-5. The allowance to those gentlemen for their expenses, was, to Mr. Pinckney about nine thousand dollars, and to Mr. Monroe upwards of eleven thousand dollars. The whole amount of expenses allowed to Mr. Adams, was $6,385—less than was ever claimed or allowed in any parallel case, since the foundation of the Government.

Of the Ministers of the United States to Europe, who have been employed at the same time, upon several distinct, important, and expensive missions, there is no one whose case approaches so nearly to that of Mr. Adams, as that of the late President, Mr. Monroe. Each was employed on four distinct missions, in three different countries, for a length of time within forty days the same. The allowances to Mr. Monroe, (prior to the act of Congress of May, 1826, by which he received ten thousand dollars more, with interest for sixteen years, as an allowance for detention at London) were $82,000; those to Mr. Adams, $75,000. Omitting fractions in both cases.

The case of Mr. Monroe is worthy, in this connexion, of the more particular attention of the House. He went to Europe in 1803, with three commissions—one as Minister resident in England, one as Joint Commissioner with Chancellor Livingston, in France, and a third as Joint Commissioner with Mr. Pinckney, in Spain. He was, on his departure, allowed an outfit as Minister to England, but was told that he could not be allowed it as Extraordinary Minister to France. He sailed for this last country in the Spring of 1803, passed a few weeks there in negotiating, in conjunction with Mr. Livingston, and went over to England. After his return to America, he claimed an outfit to France, and was allowed it by President Madison, 5th May, 1810, four days after the passage of the law of 1st

May, 1810, which is alleged to limit the allowance of outfits to Ministers going from the United States. These two outfits accrued to Mr. Monroe in the space of four months.

The next year he went to Spain, on his special mission, and was gone about nine months. For his expenses on this mission, he was allowed $11,000, in addition to his regular salary as Minister at London. It is true that a small part of this allowance was for expenses not strictly personal to himself. It was Mr. Monroe's intention to return to America in 1805, but the aspect of our negotiations making it expedient that he should continue at London, he was instructed by the President to remain there, which he did for two years longer, during which time he was associated in a negotiation with Mr. Pinckney. This detention occasioned to Mr. Monroe increased expenditure, although his residence was not changed. For this increased expenditure, he claimed an allowance, on the settlement of his accounts in 1810. This allowance was suspended by Mr. Madison; and, for obvious considerations, was not subsequently brought forward by Mr. Monroe, till the close of his administration. He then submitted it to Congress. It was examined by them at two successive sessions, under the auspices of two select committees, at the head of which was placed the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGHAM.] The equity of the claim was allowed; a bill was introduced by the gentleman, allowing, among other items, about $10,000 for this two years' detention, with interest down to the present time: a sum more than equal, without interest, to a third outfit in three years. I voted with the gentleman throughout, on the passage of this bill, believing the claim just and equitable, but without the least conception that I might ever wish to make use of it as a precedent: for I did not at that time know that any thing in the President's accounts had been subject to exception.

Thus did Congress, by a special act, make to Mr. Monroe an allowance more than equal to a third full outfit, with interest for sixteen years, notwithstanding he had already received greater compensation and allowances than those paid to Mr. A. for the same services during an equal period.

One word more as to the outfit for the mission under the mediation, before I pass from this subject. It ought, in the first place, to be observed, that the practice of allowing a full outfit to a resident Minister abroad, when commissioned on a new mission, was first introduced by Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Adams, when appointed by President Washington to Lisbon, (being Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague) had but a half outfit, and when transferred by President Adams to Berlin, had also but a half outfit. On the same rule, when Mr. Vans Murray was by President Adams appointed on the mission to France, jointly, with Messrs. Davie and Ellsworth, he was told, by order of President Adams, that a half outfit only would be allowed him. On his return home, under Mr. Jefferson's Administration, he was allowed and paid a full outfit. And the precedent then established, has since been pursued in like cases.

With respect to the outfit allowed to Mr. Adams in 1813, it was, by Mr. Madison's order, allowed and paid to Mr. Adams out of a fund entirely at the disposal of the President, on the ground of the additional expenses to be incurred, and in conjunction with his colleagues. At the next session of Congress, among the estimates from the Treasury, was one for three outfits which had already been allowed and paid out of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse. Instead of the amount of these outfits, Congress appropriated a sum equal only to two and a half; so that $22,500 only, instead of $27,000, were replaced to the contingent fund. Mr. Adams was accordingly called on to refund one-half of the outfit, which he had been allowed and paid by President Madison, and which he had received and in part expended. This he declined to do; and owing to this item, his accounts remained for some years unsettled. Living under a government of laws, and supposing he was entitled to their protection, he requested the officers of the Treasury to institute a suit against him, in order that, if a judicial tribunal decided in favor of the allowance, it might be made him: and prepared, if otherwise, to acquiesce. This, however, the Treasury declined doing. When the provision was introduced into the law, stopping the salaries of all officers in arrears to the Government, Mr. Adams appealed to the President for his decision. The President took the official advice of the Attorney General. This officer decided that the claim was undoubtedly valid, and it was allowed and paid accordingly. The opinion of the Attorney General may be found, Documents 1st Session 19th Congress, vol. x. doc. 167.

Another subject has been brought into this discussion by a gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CAMERON] on which I shall, with great reluctance, say a few words. He says that he was astonished that the Administration, after receiving 14,000 dollars in the Spring of 1823, for furnishing the President's House, should, at the next session of Congress, ask for 25,000 dollars. Sir, when, in the Spring of 1823, the usual appropriation of 14,000 dollars was made for furnishing the President's House, (which had never been entirely furnished) it was in respect to furniture, in a forlorn and destitute state. The appropriation of 14,000 dollars was accordingly almost wholly expended in articles of daily household utility. In the course of the session, a motion was made for a committee to inquire into the expediency, at that time, of finishing and furnishing the public buildings. As far as the President's House was concerned, this motion had especial reference to the large Eastern Room, which had never been furnished. This motion, I take leave to say, was made without any knowledge or agency on the part of the occupant of that house, or any of his family. The committee, thus raised, went to the President's House, to satisfy themselves, by actual inspection, of its situation, in respect to furniture. Though one of the committee, I was myself prevented by illness from attending to that duty. They found, of course, the large room empty, with the exception of a few chair frames, without seats; and in every part of the house a want of furniture, required, not for elegance and luxury, but for comfort. They then directed two artisans to examine the premises, and estimate the expense of furnishing them. For the large room two estimates were given in, one amounting to 20,000 dollars, and the other to 16,000 dollars; while the only estimate for the residue of the house was 10,000 dollars. The committee reported a gross sum of 25,000 dollars, to furnish the Eastern room, to supply the deficiency of furniture in other parts of the house, and to make some slight repairs. In this estimate, neither the President of the United States nor any member of the family, had, directly or indirectly, the least agency. The gentleman, therefore, is wholly mistaken, in saying that the Administration asked for this new appropriation.

When the bill was before the House, the gentleman from North Carolina (I think) moved to strike out the sum of 25,000 dollars. No friend of the Administration said a word in favor of retaining it. On the contrary, a gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BAZZEE] made a motion to reduce it to 5,000 dollars. A gentleman from Georgia, now its Governor, [Mr. FOSBERT] opposed the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina on the ground that, though it was mistaken policy, (in which I entirely concur with him,) to provide the President a lodging at the public expense, yet, that, having done so, it ought to be decently furnished. Another gentleman, also in opposition, [Mr. CAMERON] expressed the same sentiment, and the appropriation was retained.

Notwithstanding the mode in which this took place, a mighty clamor against the President arose throughout the country. The estimates of the upholsterers were diffused through the Opposition press. The hard, suspicious, French names of furniture, employed by these artisans, were found significant of corruption; and it was declared to be the affair of the President and his political friends. Sir, no man is above public opinion; and no matter is so small, that it may not furnish a sufficient fulcrum for moving the greatest masses. The odium excited by this small matter was intense; and, yielding to it, I did, at the next session of Congress, move to reduce the appropriation from 25,000 dollars, (for not a cent had been drawn from the Treasury) to 6,000 dollars; a sum adequate to pay for what had already been bought or contracted for. The friends of the Administration in the House were blamed for yielding to that clamor: but whoever will revert to the famous letter in the Richmond Enquirer—a gross fabrication from beginning to end, but artfully calculated for effect—and take this in connexion with the outrageous clamor which pervaded the country on the same subject, will admit that we took the proper course.

There is another matter in this connexion, to which I feel bound to advert, as the gentleman from North Carolina has especially referred to me on the subject. In engaging in their duty, in reference to the furnishing of the public buildings, the Committee thought, while so large an additional appropriation was proposed, that it would be satisfactory to the House to know, in what way the former usual appropriation had been applied. They, therefore requested the Private Secretary of the President (who they understood had been employed in superintending the furnishing of the house,) to give them a statement of what had been bought. This he accordingly did. And, among the items contained in the inventory, were a billiard table, costing fifty dollars; some of the appurtenances to it, and a set of chessmen. Now, sir, it may have been a remarkable obtuseness of moral sentiment on the part of the committee, but it so happened, that no alarm was taken by them at these dangerous articles. The inventory was reported to the House, with the other papers accompanying the bill. Forthwith, as I have already said, a portentous outcry arose. The matter was taken up with all the energy of the press; the President was denounced as the corrupter of the youth of the country; the articles themselves were declared to be parts of a splendid gambling establishment; the Administration was represented as a set (not merely politically, but morally,) of desperadoes and debauchees, and the President's House was the scene of their orgies. Columns of this loathsome cant filled the newspapers. In due time, the gentleman from North Carolina called the attention of the House to the subject. I do not say he did it in offensive terms: for I really do not recollect what he said about it. His comment had, however, the effect of giving a sanction to what had been said already elsewhere.

Now, sir, what was the President to do? Neither he, nor any one else, as I have just said, is above public opinion; he is, on the contrary, more powerfully subjected to it than any other person, for the reason that his station gives greater importance to his actions. The account was not yet settled at the Treasury. The statement submitted to the committee was nothing but the account of the President's Private Secretary, (an officer not known to the Government) with the fund. It was necessary to settle an account with the Treasury. In doing so, it was necessary for the President to charge either the public or himself with every article in the statement already rendered. It was necessary that he should either allow or disallow the particular items in question. He chose the latter. He had a right so to do; he was right in doing so. If the opponents to the Administration chose (as they did) to make a great matter out of this small one, it was the duty of the President to his friends, to take from their opponents this ground of attack. He did so; and paid for the obnoxious articles himself. The public did not pay for them.

But I shall be told that there still remains against the President the high charge of having these articles (however paid for) in his possession. The opinion which may be formed of the immorality of this act will vary according to associations. I myself have been bred up in the bosom of a virtuous community; one in which, it is supposed, something of the strictness of the Pilgrim Fathers may yet be traced in the morals of their descendants. I think I may say, that with them, no horror is felt on this subject. Among my friends, neighbors, and constituents, there are several who, deeming this relaxation not merely innocent, but a healthful exercise, when the weather does not permit exercise abroad, have the means of enjoying it in their dwelling house. Dr. Franklin, no corrupter of youth, was a great admirer of the game. Mr. Jefferson, I have been told, at one time, proposed to introduce it among the gymnastic exercises of the University of Virginia. Whether General Washington played billiards I do not know, but it is recorded of him that he played cards, which in a moral point of view, is perhaps, no better.

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH said, "General Washington played billiards."]

The gentleman from North Carolina said, that it was an insignificant affair, till the Administration made it important. Sir, is this the fact? I appeal to the gentleman, if it did not ring from Georgia to Maine; from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. I have been well assured that it has been so misrepresented to the People, in some parts of the country, as to have cost the Administration more votes than any thing else. And this abused community has been so urged and plied on the subject, through the channels of the press, that I am well informed that there are districts in the United States, in which it is firmly believed, that the private abode of the President, than whom a man of purer life does not exist in the country, is little better than a bagnio.

Sir, there is another remark which fell from the gentleman from North Carolina, which I feel bound to notice, though I do it with the utmost pain. He says, "Has the character of General Jackson alone been attacked?" No, sir, like the hyena, the felliest of the fell, which robs the graves of the dead, they have entered the sanctuary of domestic retirement, and dragged before the bar of the public, loaded with the basest slanders, the character of an innocent and much injured lady. Have they done this, and do they now complain, and charge us with wishing to heap calumny on the Administration?"

[Mr. CAMERON said he referred to the Administration presses.]

Sir, I admit the explanation. I remarked, in the outset, that I would act on the defensive. But I would wish to show the gentleman that there are two sides to this matter; and that, in reference to the presses enlisted in the present contest, the Administration have as much to forgive as to be forgiven. Allow me, Sir, to relate to you an anecdote. It happened, that, in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Adams, at St. Petersburg, was a virtuous and respectable young woman, who had gone with them from Boston, in the capacity of attendant on their infant child, possessing an unusual share of personal beauty, and an education above her employment in life. On her arrival at St. Petersburg, she heard the stories, such as often circulated in the European capitals, whether true or false, of the private life and habits of the Emperor. These stories formed a part of the letters which she wrote to her friends in America. Gentlemen know that in many countries in Europe, (and it was especially so at the peried in question, which was one of anxious political excitement,) letters committed to the post office are opened at the police. It was done in this case; and, coming as they did, from a person in the family of a foreign Minister, and dealing so freely with the Emperor's character, the letters of this individual were submitted by the police to the Emperor, and by him to the Empress, as a matter of pleasantry to both. About this time, by an act of attention not unusual towards the families of foreign Ministers, the Empress requested that the infant child of Mrs. Adams should be sent on a visit to the palace. This was accordingly done, under the charge of the individual mentioned; and the letters alluded to, and her appearance, caused her to be the object of some slight notice, on the part of the Emperor and Empress. This is the whole of the affair. She remained in the family of Mr. A. till she returned to Boston; married there a respectable citizen; from having been the servant, became the friend and visiting acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. A., and is now deceased. Such are the real facts.

Now, Sir, since the Administration presses have been charged, in this debate, with invading domestic retirement, and slandering female character, let me show you what has been made out of this innocent affair. I read it from a pamphlet, which, as I have been told, has been widely circulated, and which purports, on its title page, to be printed for one who has been introduced into this debate, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a victim of the proscribing and vindictive policy of the Administration. I will first read the text, and then the comment:

"To avert so dreadful a calamity, was the first fruits of this victory, (of New Orleans) and the hero who achieved it is, for this, entitled not only to the fervent benedictions of the designated victims, but to the veneration of all who prefer the guardian of innocence, and the protector of virtue, to a customer of bawds, or the pander of an Autocrat."

This is the text, and now follows the comment:

"It appears, that the lady of our Minister to St. Petersburg, some years since, took with her a very pretty young woman, to superintend her children. The charms of this person, while at the Capital, had been so loudly and highly extolled, that they, at length, reached the ears of the immaculate Alexander, who expressed a curiosity to behold such a prodigy of beauty. To indulge this curiosity, a secret coalition was formed, by which it was arranged that the Autocrat of all the Russias should, at a certain hour, take his airing, in a certain public walk, and that his unsuspecting object should be punctually sent thither, by those who could control her movements. This interview accordingly took place, with the consent and contrivance of those who ought to have been the special guardians of the innocence of the proffered victim, but entirely without her knowledge, or even dreaming of the frightful perils to which she was thus wantonly exposed. Fortunately, however, the abused maiden escaped outrage, and preserved her peace and honor, because the fastidious taste of the lascivious monarch did not accord with the grosser taste of those who had——"

Sir, I can read no further: I have touched this odious topic in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, who accuses the Administration presses of warring on female character; in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has alluded in this debate, to the person whose name is on this pamphlet, as a persecuted man, and who here holds up to the horror of the country, its Chief Magistrate and his wife, as having conspired to poison the virtue of an individual to whose care they had committed their own infant child.

You remember, sir, when a vile question was put to the unfortunate Queen of France, by her Revolutionary Judges, touching her son, she appealed to every female in the crowded audience, who was herself a mother, to find an answer in her own heart. I call no hard names—I never call them. But, I appeal to every father who hears me, especially to every one who has left his wife and children at a distant home, to judge of the commiseration to which he is entitled, as a persecuted man, who who could put his name to a tale like this, and send it, as I am informed, by facilities of transportation arising from Government patronage, into every cottage in the State.

Sir, there were other topics, on which I meant to have touched, but I have exhausted the little strength which I brought into the House. In the part I have taken in the discussion, I have but acted on the defensive. I own that I have been a little surprised, that it has even been made a question, whether the Administration was assailed or not. Why, sir, there has not been a day, nor an hour, since it was formed, that it has not been assailed. I do not now complain of this—I do but state the fact; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us now, what we were told two years ago, by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the very existence of the Administration was a political felony; that they have burst unlawfully into the offices of State, and that he would no more make terms with them, that is, no more "judge them by their acts," than with the robber, who, having broken into his premises, should promise to behave himself well. One gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MITCHELL] says they are already too much worn out to be attacked; and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] that they are run down; and yet we are accused of kindling at fancied charges, and bristling up in the defence, when nobody has attacked us.

Sir, such an assault, in my limited acquaintance with the history of the country, I have no where found. A Chief Magistrate, of more than ordinary simplicity of life, and purity of character, is denounced at one moment as the imitator of oriental pomp; and at the next, as the profligate corruptor of the youth of the nation. As able, faithful, and patriotic a Cabinet, as any ever formed since the first Administration of Washington, and abler than almost every other which has followed, is denounced as weak, inefficient, and corrupt. An Administration, which, in three years, has applied thirty-three millions to the payment of the public debt, and expended ten or twelve more in objects of public utility, is proclaimed to be profuse and extravagant. An Administration which came into power avowedly on the principle of seeking out the best talents of the nation, for offices of trust and honor, and which, if it has erred, has erred in neglecting its friends, is charged with proscribing and persecuting its opponents. And, after all this has been repeated, year after year, till, in its effect, gentlemen flatter themselves, and tell us that we are wasted, worn out, and run down; and after each and every one of these topics, and numerous others, have been touched, in this very debate, we are then told to keep very cool—nobody has attacked us.

But I am willing, for one, Sir, to take these declarations of gentlemen as the indication of the course which they approve, and are willing to pursue. It is time, for the honor of the country, that the war of extermination should cease. In laying waste the characters of those who, under the Constitution of the country, are clothed with the administration of its affairs, we are wasting that which is a part of the most valuable treasure of the nation. Above all, it appears to me, that it is time the vehemence with which, within these walls, the war has been waged against the Administration, should cease. In addition to its necessary and unavoidable evils, the waste of time—the sacrifice of dignity—the kindling of the worst passions; it is accompanied with the still greater evil, that it lends a kind of sanction to that ferocity of the press, which has already reached the point at which many of the most valuable citizens of the community shrink back into retirement, before the storm of obloquy that awaits every one who appears before the public.

Before I sit down, sir, I must ask leave to say, that if every member had spoken in the tone of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] I should probably not have troubled the House. To almost every remark that fell from him, I yielded a hearty assent. I feel, not less strongly than he, though I may be unable to express it with that manly force which enchaind the attention of the House, that this warfare is mali exempli, without our even being able to plead, in excuse, that the bad example sprang from a good one. The gentleman, with a liberality which I could not but admire, however little I might be willing to sanction the consciousness of political strength with which he spoke, told us that the joy of the huntsman is in the chase, and that when the game is run down, he calls off the pack, and will not let them mangle the carcass. The gentleman cannot expect me to agree with him that the game is run down, but he will agree with me, that, of the pack which sprang at the throats of this Administration, there were some, whose fangs were already fleshed in other game. And is the law of the chase altered? Will not what has been, again be? Believe me, sir, it will; the fate of Acton is no fable here: and scarcely will the gentleman's gallant huntsman—(unless some rare felicity of fortune shall elevate him above the lot of his predecessors,) scarcely will he have wound his horn in triumph, when he will find, to his amazement, that he is the game, and some of those who have shared in the triumph of the chase will turn and spring upon him.

Ille fugit per quem fuerat laeta nepe secutus.

Sir, the gentleman will pardon my allusion, as I, most cheerfully, accepted his. I make it not insidiously, nor with the slightest shade of personality; but in some measure in consideration of the well-known composition of the two great parties, and still more on the immutable principles of our nature, by which it follows, of stern necessity, that — In these cases,

We still have judgment here, that we but teach Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return

To our own lips.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and said, I cannot make the promise which the gentleman who has just taken his seat made at the outset of his address—but I will make a promise of a different nature, and one which, I trust, it will be in my power to perform—I shall not say with more good faith than the gentleman from Massachusetts—but more to the letter—aye, sir, and more to the spirit too. I shall not, as the gentleman said he would do, act in mere self-defence. I shall carry the war into Africa. I shall not be content with merely parrying—no, sir—if I can, so help me God, I will thrust also—because my right arm is nerved by the cause of the People and of my Country. I listened to the gentleman with pleasure—I mean to the general course of his remarks—with a single exception; and to that part of his speech I listened with the utmost loathing and disgust. But disgust is too feeble a term. I heard him, with horror, introduce the case of the Queen of France—and in answer to what? To a handbill—a placard—an electioneering firebrand: and in the presence of whom? Of those who never ought to be present in a theatre where men contend for victory and empire. Sir, they have no more business there than they have in a field of battle of another sort. Women, indeed, are wanted in the camp; but women of a very different description. What maiden, sir—nay, what matron—could hear the gentleman, without covering her face with her hands, and rushing out of the House? But for some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in allusion to newspaper publications, I should have begun in at least as low a key and as temperate a mood as he did. To that key I will now pitch my voice. I have been absent from the House for several days. I requested my colleague [Mr. ALEXANDER] to state the cause of that absence, which he did. Yet even this could not be reported correctly. As this may be the last act of public duty which I shall be able to perform—at least, during the present session—and as I have given up myself a sacrifice to its performance, I respectfully ask the House to give their attention to what I have now to say. I understand that, during my absence, I have been replied to by various gentlemen, (some of whom I have not the honor to know by person) on different sides of the House, in a manner which I do not doubt was perfectly satisfactory—at least, to the speakers themselves. I certainly do not wish to disturb their self-complacency, de minimis non curat, whether of persons or of things. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE] with that blunt plainness and candor which, I am told, belongs to him, and which I admire in proportion as they are rare qualities in these days—I like him the better for his sturdy honesty—I hope he will take no offence at the term, for I can assure him that none is intended—charged me, in my absence, (so my friends have informed me,) with what I believe he would not hesitate to have charged to my face, and to which I have no objection, except to the authority on which he relied; but I protest against any gentleman's producing, as proof of what I have, at any time, said, a newspaper, or any thing purporting to be a Register of Debates, unless I endorse it, and more particularly remarks drawn from the debates of another body, which, in regard to me, are particularly unfaithful. I shall shew to the House, not such matter as the gentleman from Massachusetts stirred, to the injury of every moral sense, of every moral being. I shall refer to a matter of recent notoriety: that will test the correctness of these reports. In the debate on the motion of the gentleman from South-Carolina, [Mr. HAMILTON] respecting a picture of the battle of New-Orleans, I did state, as distinctly as I could articulate, that I had seen a monument erected to the memory of Andre, the British Spy, in Westminster Abbey; that it was mutilated—the head of General Washington, and arm (I think) of Andre, having been broken off. The General's, most probably, by some Tory boy, from the neighboring school of Westminster, and that of Andre, probably, by some Whig boy, in retaliation. The name of Hamilton did not escape my lips. I thought, indeed, of Hamilton, but it was of a living Hamilton—the gentleman from South-Carolina—but, then, parliamentary usage does not permit us to speak of one another by name. Now, sir, I can shew you, on the same authority which was relied on by the gentleman from Ohio—though I acknowledge that the reports of that paper, so far, at least, as I am concerned, have generally been more accurate this year, than I have for a long time known them to be before—that I am represented as saying, that the monuments in Westminster Abbey were mutilated in the same manner as the tombs of Hamilton and Washington had been mutilated here. The word tomb never escaped my lips on that occasion. Sir, this would have been a palpable falsehood. Where is the tomb of Washington? There is no such thing in this country, nor have I ever heard that a tomb has been erected to the memory of Hamilton; but I suppose that the next thing we shall hear will be, that the Quarterly or some other Review, comes out, and observes with a sneer, that, as Roger Sherman said the vote was the monument, so a gentleman from Virginia had, by a speech in Congress, built up a tomb for Washington—a “constructive” tomb, that existed no where but in his eccentric imagination. Sir, the tombs of Washington and of Hamilton might stand any where in this country unclosed—they might indeed be liable to injury from the beasts of the field, or from some invidious foreigner, but the hand of no American would ever mutilate them. Sir, in the course of another debate, it seems that I rendered to a gentleman from New-York [Mr. STORRS] the homage which his abilities deserved—and God forbid that the time should ever arrive when I refuse to do justice to an adversary—when I shall disparage any merit, because it is found in the person of an opponent. When that time shall arrive, may I never receive mercy from that fountain of it to which alone we all must look, if we hope for forgiveness hereafter. I said that I would not, like him, pronounce a palinodia, neither am I now going to pronounce a palinodia in respect to the gentleman from New York. I shall not take back one jot of praise bestowed upon him. With whatever views he introduced it, the doctrine has always been mine—the strict subordination of the military to the civil authority—scripture is scripture, by whom, or for whatever purpose it may be quoted. I know nothing of the private habits of that gentleman, [Mr. STORRS] but I know that he has too much good taste not to agree with me, that time may be much better spent than in reading the Documents piled up here. Yet, in the report of that debate, I was represented as saying, that, like the gentleman from New York, I did not—what? pronounce a palinodia? No, sir, not at all—but, that, like him, I did not read the Documents. Sir, nobody reads the Documents—for this plain reason, that no man can read them—and if he could, he could hardly be worse employed. Sir, with a few exceptions, the Documents are printed that they may be printed, not that they may be read.

And now, sir, comes another charge, about the miserable oppressed inhabitants of Ireland. This subject has been mentioned to me, by no gentleman on the other side, except a member from Maryland—from the Eastern shore of Maryland, [Mr. KENN] who is, not only by the courtesy of this House, but is in fact, a gentleman. He, in Committee on the Rules and Orders of the House, expressed to me his astonishment that what I said on that occasion could have been so much misunderstood and misrepresented—that he heard me most distinctly. I now call on any member who understood me differently, at the time, to rise in his place and say so. [Here Mr. K. paused for reply. None being given, and some friends having said across the seats, that no member could or would say, that he had understood Mr. K. as he had been misrepresented, Mr. K. went on.] Without meaning to plead to—that is without meaning to admit, the jurisdiction of the press, in the extent which it arrogates to itself, I am perfectly sensible that no man is above public opinion. God forbid that any man in this country shall ever be able to brave it—and I regret that any one should have supposed me capable of uttering such sentiments. So far from it, I have been the steady, firm, constant, and strenuous advocate, to the best of my poor ability, of the oppressed People of Ireland. And why? For the reason I stated on a former occasion. They fought our battles, sir. I have known and esteemed many of them. Some of them have been—they are dead; and others are living, among my warmest friends and best neighbors. In the course of a most uneventful life, I have seen many things, but I have yet to see that rara avis in terris—I have seen a black swan—an Irish Tory. I have known stories of every description. Yes, sir, and some even in Virginia—even we had a few of them during the Revolution, but too few to give us any trouble or alarm—but I never have yet seen an Irish Tory, or the man who had seen one. Sir, I don't read the newspapers—I don't read gentlemen's speeches, and then come here to answer them. But I am extremely pleased, nay, flattered, in the highest degree, at being told by my friends, that the gentleman from Ohio attributed, in his speech, so much to my efforts in bringing the Administration to its present lank and lean condition. The gentleman could not have pleased me better—I only fear that, with all his bluntness and frankness, the gentleman was not quite sincere, and was only adorning me with fillets and garlands, like the priests of the sacrifice of yore, previous to knocking me, and with me, the party whom he strives to wound, through my sides, on the head. He was pleased to place me at the head, of what has been denominated the Opposition party in this House; but at its head, or that of any other party in this House, he will never find me, for reasons which I could state, but which are wholly unnecessary. Times are indeed changed with the gentleman and his friends, when they hold this language concerning me. But a little while ago, and the friends of the Administration, nay, the members of the Administration, affected to consider me as one of their firmest props. They could not, indeed, vote for me—they were men too nice in their principles for that: but, considering the great benefit which they derived from my opposition, they could not (except for the honor of the country) regret my re-election. Amiable and excellent men! But they now sing to a very different gamut. If any gentleman will bring against me any allegation, from a clean and respectable source, I will do one of two things—I will either deny it, or admit it, and defend it upon my views and principles. Sir, it seems I committed a great offence in not voting for the admission of the new States into the Union, and especially of Ohio. Yet, sir, if the thing were to do over again, I should act precisely in the same manner, and past experience would teach me I was right. What were the new States? Vast deserts of woods, inhabited by the Aborigines, to whom, if we come to the question of right, they did of right belong; and it was a question whether sound policy would dictate that we ought, by creating these States, to encourage sparse settlements, and thereby to weaken our frontier. I thought this was bad policy. Not that I am in favor of a very dense population. I am against the rabble of your great cities, but I am equally opposed to having a land without inhabitants. But, sir, I had other reasons—graviora mentes—Does the gentleman from Ohio, with all his laudable prejudice and partiality toward his own State, think that I, as a Virginian, feeling at least equal prejudice and partiality to my native land with that which he feels for his State, would lend my sanction to an act on the part of Virginia, which beggars every instance of fatuity and folly extant in the history of nations? Why, sir, the Knight of La Mancha himself, or poor old Lear in the play, never was guilty of a grosser act of fatuity than was the State of Virginia, when she committed that suicidal deed—the surrendering of her immense territory beyond the River Ohio, upon the express condition of excluding her own citizens from its benefit, when the country (yielded for the common good of the Confederacy,) should come to be settled. Yes, sir, it was an act of suicide—of political suicide—the effects of which she has felt, and will continue to feel, so long as she has any political existence at all. Sir, this was one of those amiable and philanthropic acts of legislation, which, however good in point of intention, lead to the most disastrous and ruinous consequences. Can the gentleman from Ohio conceive that I, a Virginian, could further this cut-throat policy? Sir, I thought the Ohio a well-defined natural boundary, and that we ought not to weaken by extending our frontier. The late war verified my foresight. Whom have I injured? The native savages and the trees, or the States that have been drained of their population to fill out Ohio? Sir, I offered no wrong to the people of Ohio: for there were then none to injure. They have gone there, or have been born since. Sir, this was the "head and front of my offending," and, if the gentleman has his apparatus ready, I am prepared to undergo any form of execution which his humanity will allow him to inflict, or which even his justice may award.

The gentleman from Massachusetts cannot expect that I shall follow him through his elaborate detail of the diplomatic expenses of this Government. The House, however, will permit me to observe, that there was a hiatus—valde defendus, I do not doubt, but certainly not deeply lamented by me—a hiatus which embraces the whole period of the Administration of Mr. Jefferson. I am not going into the question of these expenses; I will stir no such matter. Demands which have dogged the doors of the Treasury so long and so perserveringly as that they have been at length allowed, some from motives of policy, others to get rid of importunate and sturdy beggars—although they were disallowed under Mr. Jefferson's Administration. But, sir, if every claim that gets through this House, or is allowed by this Government, after years of importunity, (some of them of thirty years' standing) is for that reason considered by the gentleman as a just claim, and fit to be drawn into precedent, my notions of justice, and of sound precedent, differ greatly from his. I, too, sir, am as much opposed as he can be to what is truly called the prodigality of parsimony. The gentleman thinks the salaries of our foreign Ministers are too low, and therefore, that they must be eked out by these allowances from the contingent fund—out of what is called the secret service money. The gentleman is right as to the existence of such a fund. It was appointed, and perhaps properly, for Washington was to be the first who was charged with its disbursement. But, sir, our early Presidents always made it a point of honor to return this fund untouched. They said to the nation, you trusted me with your purse, I have had no occasion to use it, here it is; count the money; there is as much by tale and as much by weight, as I received from you—but was it ever dream't that such a fund was to be put into the hands of the President of the United States to furnish him with the means of rewarding his favorites? No, sir; it was to pay those waiters and chamber-maids, and eavesdroppers, and parasites, and panders, that the gentleman told us of on the other side of the water—and there it might be all very right and proper—but not here, sir, because we flatter ourselves, that the state of morals in this country is such as to save us from any such necessity. No gentleman would understand him as speaking of the sums which had been placed at the disposal of different Presidents, to a vast amount, for the purpose of negotiating with the Barbary Powers, &c.; but of that amount set apart, and generally known, as secret service money. Mr. Jefferson used a small portion of this fund one year, to pay some expense in relation to Burr's conspiracy, which was not allowed at the Treasury. Sir, with regard to the old billiard table, which is said to have cost some fifty dollars, it is a subject I should never have mentioned. I consider that game as a healthy, manly, rational mode of exercise, when the weather is such as to confine us within doors. I shall certainly never join in any cant or clamor against it. I look upon it as a suitable piece of furniture in the house of any gentleman who can afford it, where it is allowed by law, as it is here and throughout the State of Maryland; and I should be sorry if we were to proscribe that manly and innocent amusement. If I have any objection to that item, it is that such a pitiful article should have been bought. I would have given him one that cost five hundred dollars, and I would have voted the appropriation with cheerfulness. My objection to such a charge, is, that it is a shabby affair, and looks too much like a sneaking attempt to propitiate, by the cheapness of the thing, popular displeasure. The attempt to keep the thing out of sight, only makes the matter still worse. I do not charge the gentleman from North Carolina with any such intention, but this seems to me to be too small a matter. I would strike at higher game. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that Franklin received a higher compensation than Mr. Adams and other Ministers of these times. He did, sir, and what was the answer which that shrewd and sensible man gave (for Poor Richard had always an eye to the main chance) when his accounts were scrutinised into, and his receipts were deemed exorbitant? It was this, sir: Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. The very answer, sir, that I myself gave in Morrison's Hotel, in Dublin, to a squireen and an agent. For a description of these varieties of the plagues of Ireland, see Miss Edgworth—delightful, ingenious, charming, sensible, witty, inimitable, though not unimitated, Miss Edgworth. When describing the misery of the South and West of Ireland, that I had lately travelled over, I was asked, and what would you do, pray, sir, for the relief of Ireland? with an air that none but Miss Edgworth can describe, and that no one that has not been in Ireland can conceive. My reply was, I would unmuzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn; and I had like to have got myself into a sad scrape by it, as any one who has been in Ireland will readily understand. Yes, sir, I was disposed to give to the houseless, naked, shivering, half-starved Irish laborer, something like a fair portion of the product of his toil, of the produce of the land on which he breathes, but does not live, to put victuals into his stomach, clothes upon his back, and something like a house over his head, instead of the wretched pig-sty, that is now his only habitation—shelter it is none; and this was just the last remedy that an Irish agent or middle man, or tythe-proctor, or absentee, would prescribe or submit to.

But, Sir, to return. "These salaries are too small." I cannot agree with the gentleman. There is one touchstone of such a question—it is the avidity with which those situations are sought—I will not say by members of this House—we are hardly deemed of sufficient rank to fill them. Sir, so long as these foreign missions are sought with avidity—so long as members of Congress, and not of this House only, or chiefly, will bow, and cringe, and duck, and fawn, and get out of the way at a pinching vote, or lend a helping hand at a pinching vote, to obtain these places, I never will consent to enlarge the salary attached to them. Small as the gentleman tells us these salaries are, I will take it on me to say, that they are three times as great as the nett proceeds of his estate, made by any planter on the Roanoke. But, then, we are told that they live at St. Petersburg and London, and that living there is very expensive. Well, sir, who sent them there? Who pressed them to go there? Were they impressed, sir? Were they taken by a press gang, on Tower hill, knocked down, handcuffed, chucked on board of a tender, and told that they must take the pay and rations which his Majesty was pleased to allow? No such thing, sir. I will now quit this subject, and say only this, that our Minister, (Mr. Adams) was paid for a constructive journey—that, I think, is the phrase—which means neither more nor less than a journey which was never performed.

[Here Mr. Everett made a gesture of dissent.]

The gentleman shakes his head. Sir, we shall see more of this hereafter, but I will reason only hypothetically. If the gentleman in question, while he remained at St. Petersburg, could make the journey imputed to him, it beats the famous journey from Mexico to Tacubaya, as far as some distance, however small, exceeds no distance whatever. Sir, if a gentleman from Washington goes to Georgetown, or to Alexandria, yes, sir, or to Bladensburg, I will acknowledge that he performs, at least in some sense, a sort of journey. But not if he remains in this city, and never stirs out of it. However, I will not now press this matter further—others will do more justice to it—de minimis non curat.

Paulo majora canamus.

There was one remark, which I took down while the gentleman was speaking, and which I cannot pass by. Who that gentleman was, described by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who proposed to him that, if he would move to raise these salaries, that gentleman would join with him and support him, I cannot conjecture or divine. Be he who he may, I will venture to say thus much. He is some gentleman who expects to be sent upon some mission himself, and, with great forecast and prudence, he was calculating to throw upon the present Administration, beforehand, all the odium of the increase of the salary which he hoped to finger. I am disposed to be more just to the gentleman and to the Administration, because I believe that he will get full as much as he may deserve, and they have full as much weight as they can carry, without adding to it another feather.

Sir, I am afraid I may be charged with some want of continuity, but, what I have to say, is at least as relevant, aye, and as pertinent, too, to the subject before the House, as the handbill which the gentleman read, till his delicacy would permit him to read no farther, though I must confess I thought that he had already gone so far, that there was no ultima Thule beyond. Sir, the gentleman might have spared himself this last exertion of his delicacy, and even have read to the end. There could be nothing more gross behind, than what we had already heard, and were to hear, in the case of the ill-fated Queen of France. The gentleman with much gravity, with some dexterity, and with great plausibility, but against certain principles which I have held in this House, ab ovo, and which I shall continue to hold, usque ad mala, till I leave the feast, spoke of the headlong commencement of the Opposition, before the Administration could give reasonable cause of discontent. Sir, I have now no palinodia to sing or to chaunt upon that subject. I drew my conclusions from that fountain which never failed an observing and a sagacious man, and which, even the simple and inexperienced (and I among the rest) may drink at—it is nature and human life. I saw distinctly, from the beginning, that, if we permitted this Administration—if we listened to those who cried to us "wait, wait, there is a lion in the path," (and, sir, there always is a lion in the path, to the sluggard, and to the dastard,) and which cry was seconded, no doubt, by many who wished to know how the land lay before they ran for a port—on which side victory would incline, before they sounded their horn of triumph—if we had thus waited, Sir, the situation of the country would have been very different from what it is now. Sir, there was a great race to be run—if you will permit me to draw an illustration from a sport to which I have been much addicted—one in which all the gentlemen in Virginia, when we had gentlemen in Virginia, delighted, and of which I am yet very fond—I mean from the turf—and it must be lost, or won, as the greatest race in this country was won—I mean the race on Long Island, which I saw, and that was by running every inch of the ground—by going off at score—by following the policy of Purdy. Purdy, Sir, was a man of sound sense, and practical knowledge—a man of common sense, I mean, and worth a thousand of your old and practised statesmen, and "premature" gentlemen, who never arrive at maturity—and who, meaning to side with the next Administration in case of our success, were nevertheless resolved to get all they could, in the meantime, out of this. Sir, to one of these trimming gentry, it is worse than death to force him to take sides before a clear indication of victory, and hence the cry of its being "premature" to stir the question of the next Presidential election. Sir, if we had set off one session later, we should not have had ground enough left to run upon, to overtake, and pass, and beat them, before they would have passed the winning post, and pocketed the stakes. Such would have been the effect, if we had delayed our push, and I know no one that would have enjoyed the result, and chuckled at our folly with more hearty glee, than one of these same old and practised statesmen, [Here something was said which our reporter did not hear, and to which Mr. EVERETT was understood to reply, that he had not stated it as his sentiment, but as a fact.] I beg the gentleman's pardon; I never was misrepresented by him, I never will misrepresent him, unless I misunderstand him. But, I wonder it never occurred to the gentleman from Massachusetts what could be the cause why such a hue and cry should be raised against an Administration so very able, (permit me in this, however, to differ from the gentlemen, de gustibus non est) what, I say, could have been the cause why Acton and all his hounds, or, rather, why the dogs of war were let slip against this wise, and able, and virtuous, and loving Administration; these patterns of political friendship and consistency; and have continued to pursue them, till they lie panting and gasping for breath on the high way—until they realize the beautiful fable of the hare and many friends. The cause of all this is to be found in the manner in which they came into power—the cause of this "premature" opposition lies there, and there mainly. I would defy all the public presses in the world to have brought them to this pass, had there not been a taint of original sin in their body politic, and which cleaves to them even as the sin of our first parents taints our fallen nature, and cleaveth to us all. The gentleman refers to those who compose the party called the Opposition, and says, it is formed of very discordant materials. True, Sir; but what are the materials of the party which upholds the Administration? Nay, of the Administration itself? Are they perfectly homogeneous? I know one of them—who has been raised to a higher station than most men in this country—was that because he opposed, or because he espoused the election of the present Chief Magistrate? Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, what could cause the old Republican party in New England—the worthy successors of John Langdon—to be now found acting with us! They know—but perhaps some in this House do not know—they know that the Southern interest is as much their natural ally, in protecting them against an overweening oligarchy at home, as England is the natural ally of Portugal, against the power of Spain and France; and though they left us for a time, yet now, apprehending danger, and seeing through the artifices of their betrayer, they have returned to us, their old, natural, and approved allies. Sir, have not the Administration, as well as the Opposition, ways and means and funds in their hands, to obtain influence and buy success? Have they not the whole of the great mass of patronage in their hands? But the gentleman says, that, so far from taking care of their adherents, they have been too liberal in bestowing this upon their enemies: but it is easy to account for this. An ancient apothegm tells us that it is better to judge between two of your enemies than between two of your friends. In the one case you are almost sure, by your decision, to make a friend, and in the other, to lose one. Now, sir, our able and practised statesmen know, that, by giving a loaf and a fish to an enemy, they make a friend, when, by giving them to one of their friends, they might disoblige another, who might think his claims disparaged—and that, sir, is the whole secret of their neglecting their friends.

Permit me, sir, again to ask, how comes it that this Administration are brought into their present very curious and unprecedented predicament? How happens it that they alone, of all the Administrations which have been in this country, find themselves in the minority in each

House of Congress, when the very worst of their predecessors kept a majority till midnight on the 3d or the 4th of March, whichever you may please to call it? Ay, sir, under the Administration to which I allude, there were none of those compunctious visitings of nature, at the attacks made on private character. We had no chapter of Lamentations then, on the ravaging and desolating war on the fair fame of all the wise, virtuous, and good, of our land. The notorious Peter Porcupine, since even better known as William Cobbett, was the especial protégé of that Administration. I heard them say—I do not mean the Head of that Administration, but one of its leaders—that he was the greatest man in the world; and I do not know, sir, that, in point of sheer natural endowment, he was so very far wrong. Yes, sir, it was that very Cobbett, who if the late publications may be trusted, now says that Mr. Adams has fifteen hundred slaves in Virginia. Sir, was there any slander too vile, too base, for that man to fabricate? I remember well the Nick-names under which we passed—yes, sir, I can proudly say, we, although the humblest in the ranks. Mr. Gallatin was CRÉTEUR GUILLON, with le petit fenêtre national, at his back. My excellent and able colleague, Mr. Nicholas—one of the purest and most pious of men, who afterwards removed to the State of N. York, and was a model of republican virtue and simplicity that might have adorned the best days of Sparta or of Rome—he, sir, having the misfortune to lose an eye, was held up to ridicule as POLYPRIMUS. You are shocked at this, sir, but let me tell you that it was only a little innocent, harmless, federal wit—and the author was the especial protégé of “Government” and its adherents. All chuckled over the Porcupine. To that party the present incumbent then belonged—and another member of this pure Administration. My venerable friend from North Carolina, was MONSIEUR MACON with a cedilla under the g, to mark him the more for a Frenchman. I forget the cognomen of the learned gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON:] I know that he was never spared: I remember well my own; I wish, sir, it was applicable now, for I was then a boy. Every sanctuary was invaded. As to Mr. Jefferson, every epithet of vituperation was exhausted upon him. He was an Atheist, a Frenchman: we were all Atheists and Traitors; our names and cause, associated with the Cannibals and Cannibalism of the Revolutionary Tribunal, and all the atrocities, the most atrocious and revolting of which has this day been presented to the House by the chaste imagination of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Yes, sir, then, as now, a group of horrors was pressed upon the public imagination to prop the sinking cause of a desperate Administration. Religion and Order were to be subverted; the National Debt to be sponged; and the Country to be drenched in its best blood by Mr. Jefferson and his Jacobin adherents. Even good men, and not unwise men, were brought to believe this. Mr. Jefferson was elected—and we know what followed. But this, sir, it may be said, was not done by our own people—it was done by foreign hirelings, mercenaries. Sir, it is not only of this description of persons that I speak. It was done in the glorious days of the Sedition Law and the black cockade, when we found in General Shee and his Legion, protection against the Prætorian bands of the Administration. These brave fellows were many of them Irish or German, and most of them of Irish or German parentage, chiefly from the Northern Liberties, then the strong hold of Republicanism; and, therefore, branded with the opprobrious name of the Fauxbourg St. Antoine the most Jacobin quarter of Paris.

Sir, at the very time that the act noted by the gentleman from Massachusetts was passed, (May, 1800) when Professor Cooper was escorted to jail, a victim of the Sedition Law, the New York election, then, as of late, rung the knell of the departing Administration. Sir, when the gentleman favored us with his opinion of the present stupendous Administration, I imagine he drew it from a comparison with some of the Administrations which preceded it. In comparison with some of them, even this Administration is great: for we have seen the least of all possible things—the poorest of all poor creatures that ever was manufactured into a Head of a Department (and that's a bold word) a member of a former Administration—almost a satire on the name. This personage, as I have very lately learned in imitation of another great man from the same State, took great liberties, in public, with my name, when he had the Atlantic for a barrier, the Summer before last. Like his great friend, his courage shows itself three thousand miles off. It is in the ratio of the squares of the distances of his adversary. Sir, I should like to have seen how he would have looked, if, on finishing his harangue, he had found me at his elbow. I think I can conceive how he would have felt.

Sir, I have much to say, which neither my own weakness, nor my regard to the politeness of this House, will permit me now to say. As I have exonerated the principal in that weighty affair of the billiard-table, I also exonerate him and his Lieutenant from every charge of collusion—in the first instance; and, if it is in order, I will state the reasons for my opinion. When the alliance was first patched up between the two great leaders of the East and West, neither of the high contracting parties had the promotion of the present incumbent at all in view. Sir, I speak knowingly as to one of these parties, and with the highest degree of moral probability of the other. Can it be necessary that I prove this? The thing proves itself. The object was to bring in one of the parties to the compact, whom the Constitution subsequently excluded and of course to provide for the other. A gentleman, then of this House, was the candidate who, to the last hour, cast many a longing, although not lingering look, with outstretched neck, towards Louisiana—jugulo quesita negatur—to discover whether or not he should be one upon the list. Sir, it is impossible that he could in the first instance, have looked to the elevation of another, or have designed to promote the views of any man but in subservience to his own. Sir, common sense forbids it. But, sir, all these calculations, however skillful, and DEMOINER could not have made better, utterly failed. Mr. Crawford most obstinately, and unreasonably, I confess, refused to die. It was certainly very disobliging in him. I saw him before I went abroad, and I thought it was an hundred to one that he could not survive the Summer: he was then dead to every purpose, public or private. Louisiana refused to vote as obstinately as Mr. Crawford refused to die; and so the gentleman was excluded. It was then that Mr. Adams was first taken up, as a pis aller, which we planters of the South translate, a hand plant.

Sir, I have a right to know—I had a long while before an interview with the very great man—but not on that subject—no sir—it was about business of this House—and he so far descended, or I should rather say of so very great a man, condescended, as to electioneer even with me. He said to me, among other matters, if you of the South will give us of the West any other man than John Quincy Adams for President, we will support him. Let any man deny this who dare—but remember, sir, he then expected to be a candidate before the House himself. If you will give us any other man. Sir, the gentleman in question can have no disposition to deny it. It was at a time when he and the present incumbent were publicly pitted against each other, and Mr. Adams had crowed defiance, and clapped his wings against the Cock of Kentucky. Sir, I knew this to be a strong mode of expression. I did not take it literally. I thought I understood the meaning to be that Virginia, by her strenuous support of Mr. Crawford, would further the same cess of Mr. Adams. "Any other man, sir, besides John Quincy Adams." Now, as neither Mr. Crawford nor General Jackson, in the end, proved to be "any other man"—it follows clearly who any other man was, viz; one other man—id est myself, as a gentleman once said in this House, we will support him. But, sir, as soon as this egomet was out of the question, we of the South lost all our influence, and "we of the West" gave us of the South this very John Quincy Adams for President, and received from him the very office, which, being held by him, we of the West assigned as the cause of our support, considering it to be a sort of reversionary interest in the Presidency. (See the letter to Mr. F. Brooke.) It was indeed "ratsbane in our mouth," but we swallowed the arsenic. Sir, a powerful party in New England was equally opposed to Mr. Adams—the high Federal party, or the Essex Junto, so called—all the successors of the George Cabots, and Caleb Strong, and Stephen Higginsons—I should rather say their representatives, and all their surviving coadjutors, were against him, with one exception, and that was an honest man, of whom it was said in this House, that he ought to desire no other epitaph but that which might truly be inscribed on his tomb. "Here lies the man who was honored by the friendship of Washington, and the enmity of his successor." Sir, who persecuted the name of Hamilton while living, and followed him beyond the grave? The father and the son. Who were the persecutors of Fisher Ames, whose very grave was haunted, as if by vampyres? Both father and son. Who attempted to libel the present Chief Justice, and procure his impeachment—making the seat of John Smith, of Ohio, the peg to hang the impeachment on? The son? Sir, I, as one of the grand jury, and my colleague, [Mr. GARRETT] were called upon by the Chairman of the Committee of the Senate, in Smith's case, [Mr. Adams] to testify in that case. [Here something was said that our reporter could not hear.] This was one of the early oblations of the present incense on the altar of his new political church. Who accused his former Federal associates of a traitorous conspiracy with the British authorities in Canada, to dismember the Union? The present incumbent. Yet all is forgiven him; Hamilton, Ames, Marshall, themselves accused of treason—all is forgiven; and these men, (with one exception) now support him—and for what? Sir, I will take the letter to the President of the Court of Appeals in Virginia—and on that letter, and on facts which are notorious as the sun at noonday, it must be established that there was a collusion, and a corrupt collusion, between the principals in this affair. I do not say the agreement was a written or even a verbal one—I know that the language of the poet is true—that men, who "meet to do a damned deed," cannot bring even themselves to speak of it in distinct terms—they cannot call a spade, a spade—but eke out their unholy purposes with dark hints, and innuendoes, and signs, and shrugs, where more is meant than meets the ear. Sir, this person was willing to take any man who would secure the end that he had in view. He takes office under Mr. Adams, and that very office too which had been declared to be in the line of safe precedent—that very office which decided his preference of Mr. Adams. Sir, are we children? are we babies? can't we see or eat an apple-pie without spelling and putting the letters together—A, p, ap, p, l, e, pie, apple, p, i, e, pie, apple-pie? Sir, the fact can never be got over, and it is this fact which alone could make this Administration to rock and totter to its base, in spite of the indiscretion, (to say no worse) in spite of all the indiscretion of its adversaries. For, Sir, there never was a man who had so much cause as General Jackson has had to say, "save me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies." Yes, Sir, he could take care of his enemies—from them he never feared danger; but not of his friends at least of some, whose vanity has prompted them to couple their obscure names with his; and it is because he did take care of his enemies, who were his country's enemies, and for other reasons, which I could state, that his cause is now espoused by that grateful country. But General Jackson is no statesman. Sir, I deny that there is any instance on record, in history, of a man not having military capacity, being at the head of any Government with advantage to that Government, and with credit to himself. Sir, there is a great mistake on this subject. It is not those talents which enable a man to write books and make speeches, that enable him to preside over a Government. The wittiest of Poets has told us that

"All a Rhetorician's Rules Teach only how to name his Tools."

We have seen Professors of Rhetoric, who could no doubt descant fluently upon the use of these said tools; yet sharpen them to so wiry an edge as to cut their own fingers with these implements of their trade. Sir, Thomas à Becket was as brave a man as Henry the Second, and, indeed, a braver man—less infirm of purpose. And who were the Hildebrands, and the rest of the Papal Freebooters, who achieved victory after victory over the proudest Monarchs and States of Europe? These men were brought up in a cloister, perhaps, but they were endowed with the highest of all the gifts of Heaven, the capacity to lead men, whether in the Senate or in the field. Sir, it is one and the same faculty, and its successful display has always received, and ever will receive, the highest honors that man can bestow; and this will be the case, do what you will, cant what you may, about military chieftains and military domination. So long as a man is a man, the victorious defender of his country will and ought to receive, that country's suffrage, for all that the forms of her Government allow her to bestow.

Sir, a friend said to me not long since, "Why, General Jackson can't write"—"admitted." (Pray, sir, can you tell me of any one that can write: for, I protest, I know nobody that can.) Then turning to my friend, I said, it is most true that General Jackson cannot write, (not that he can't write his name, or a letter, &c.) because he has never been taught. But his competitor cannot write, because he was unteachable: for he has had every advantage of education and study. Sir, the Duke of Marlborough, the greatest captain and negotiator of his age—which was the age of Louis XIV.—and who may rank with the greatest men of any age; whose irresistible manners and address triumphed over every obstacle in council, as his military prowess and conduct did in the field—sir, this great man could not even spell, and was notoriously ignorant of all that an under graduate must know; but which it is not necessary for a man at the head of affairs to know, at all. Would you have superseded him by some Scotch schoolmaster? Sir, gentlemen forget that it is an able helmsman we want for the ship of State, and not a Professor of navigation or astronomy:

Sir, among the vulgar errors that ought to go into Sir Thomas Brown's book, this ought not to be omitted: that learning and wisdom are synonymous, or at all equivalent. Knowledge and wisdom, as one of our most delightful poets sings—

"Knowledge and wisdom, far from being one,
Have oft times no connexion—knowledge dwells
In heads replete with thoughts of other men;
Wisdom, in minds attentive to their own.
Knowledge is proud that he has learned so much;
Wisdom is humble that he knows no more.
Books are not seldom talismans and spells,
By which the magic art of shrewder wits
Holds the unthinking multitude enchained."

And not books only, Sir,—speeches are not less deceptive. Sir, I not only consider the want of what is called learning not to be a disqualification for the command in chief in civil or military life, but I do consider the possession of too much learning to be of most mischievous consequence to such a character ; who is to draw from the cabinet of his own sagacious mind, and to make the learning of others, or whatever other qualities they may possess, subservient to his more enlarged and vigorous views. Such a man was Cromwell—such a man was Washington. Not learned, but wise. Their understandings were not clouded or cramped, but had fair play. Their errors were the errors of men, not of school boys and pedants. Sir, so far from the want of what is called education being a very strong objection to a man at the head of affairs, over-education constitutes a still stronger objection. [In the case of a lady it is fatal. Heaven defend me from an over-educated, accomplished lady. Yes, sir, accomplished indeed, for she is finished for all the duties of a wife, or mother, or mistress of a family.] Sir, we hear much of military usurpation, of military despotism—of the sword of a conqueror—of Cæsar—and Cromwell—and Bonaparte. What little I know of Roman history has been gathered chiefly from the surviving letters of the great men of that day—of Cicero especially—and I freely confess to you, that, if I had then lived, and been compelled to take sides, I must, though very reluctantly, have sided with Cæsar, rather than take Pompey for my master. Sir, it was the interest of the house of Stuart—and they were long enough in power to do it—to blacken the character of Cromwell—that great, and, I must add, bad man. But, sir, the devil himself is not so black as he is sometimes painted. But who would not rather have obeyed Cromwell, than that self-styled Parliament, which obtained a title too indecent for me to name, but by which it is familiarly known and mentioned in all the historians, from that to this day. Sir, Cromwell fell under a temptation, perhaps too strong for the nature of man to resist—but he was an angel of light to either of the Stuarts—the one whom he brought to the block ; or his son, a yet worse man, the blackest and foulest of miscreants that ever polluted a throne. It has been the policy of the house of Stuart and their successors—it is the policy of Kings—to vilify and blacken the memory and character of Cromwell. But the cloud is rolling away. We no longer consider Hume as deserving of the slightest credit. Cromwell was “guiltless of his country’s blood.” His was a bloodless usurpation. To doubt his sincerity at the outset, from his subsequent fall, would be madness—religious fervor was the prevailing temper and fashion of the times. Cromwell was an usurper, ’tis granted ; but he had scarcely any choice left him. His sway was every way preferable to that miserable corpse of a Parliament, that he turned out, as a gentleman would turn off a drunken butler and his fellows, or the pensioned tyrant that succeeded him—a dissolute, depraved bigot and hypocrite, who was outwardly a Protestant and at heart a Papist. He lived and died one, while pretending to be a son of the church of England, aye, and swore to it, and died a perjured man. Sir, if I must have a master, give me one whom I can respect rather than a knot of knavish Attorneys. Sir, Bonaparte was a bad man ; but I would rather have had Bonaparte than such a set of corrupt, intriguing, public plunderers as he turned adrift. The Senate of Rome—the Parliament of England—the Councils of Elders and of Youngsters—the Legislature of France—all made themselves first odious and then contemptible ; and then comes an usurper, and this is the natural end of a corrupt civil Government.

There is a class of men who possess great learning, combined with inveterate professional habits, and who are, (ipso facto, or perhaps I should rather say ipsis factis, for I must speak accurately as I speak before a Professor) disqualified for any but secondary parts any where—even in the Cabinet. Cardinal Richelieu was, what ? A Priest. Yes, sir, but what a Priest !—Oxenstierna was a Chancellor. He it was who sent his son abroad to see—quam parva sapientia regitur mun- das—with how little wisdom this world is governed.—This Administration seemed to have calculated that even less than that little would do for us. The gentleman called it a strong, an able Cabinet—second to none but Washington’s first Cabinet. Sir, I could hardly look at him for blushing. What, sir, is Gallatin at the head of the Treasury—Madison in the Department of State ? The mind of an accomplished and an acute dialectician, of an able lawyer, or, if you please, of a great physician, may, by the long continuance of one pursuit—of one train of ideas—have its habits so inveterately fixed, as effectually to disqualify the possessor for the command of the councils of a country. He may, nevertheless, make an admirable chief of a bureau—an excellent man of details—which the chief ought never to be. A man may be capable of making an able and ingenious argument on any subject within the sphere of his knowledge ; but, sir, every now and then the master sophist will start, as I have seen him start, at the monstrous conclusions to which his own artificial reason had brought himself. But this, sir, was a man of more than ordinary natural candor and fairness of mind. Sir, by words and figures you may prove just what you please ; but it often and most generally is the fact, that, in proportion as a proposition is locally or mathematically true, it is politically and common-sensically (or rather nonsensically) false. The talent which enables a man to write a book, or make a speech, has no more relation to the leading of an army or Senate, than it has to the dressing of a dinner. The talent which fits a man to head a Government, is the talent for the management of men—a mere dialectician never had, and never will have it : both requires the same degree of courage, though of different kinds. The very highest degree of moral courage is required for the duties of government. I have been amused when I have seen some dialecticians, after assorting their words—“the counters of wise men, the money of fools”—after they had laid down their premises, and drawn, step by step, their deductions, sit down, completely satisfied, as if the conclusions to which they had brought themselves were really the truth—as if it were irrefragably true. But wait until another cause is called, or till another Court sits—till the bystanders and jury have had time to forget both argument and conclusion, and they will make you just as good an argument on the opposite side, and arrive, with the same complacency, at a directly opposite conclusion, and triumphantly demand your assent to this new truth. Sir, it is their business—I do not blame them. I only say that such a habit of mind unfits men for action, for decision. They want a client to decide which side to take ; and the really great man performs that office for them. This habit unfits them for Government in the first degree. The talent for Government lies in these two things—agacity to perceive, and decision to act. Genuine statesmen were never made such by mere training ; education will form good business men—nascuntur non fiunt. The maxim (nascitur non fit) is as true of statesmen as it is of poets. Sir, let a house be on fire, you will soon see in that confusion who has the talent to command. Let a ship be in danger at sea, and ordinary subordination destroyed, and you will immediately make the same discovery. The ascendancy of mind and of character exists and rises as naturally and as inevitably, where there is free play for it, as material bodies find their level by gravitation. Thus a great diplomatist, like a certain animal, oscillating between the hay on different sides of him, wants some power from without, before he can decide from which bundle to make trial. Who believes that Washington could write as good a book or report as Jefferson, or make as able a speech as Hamilton ? Who is there that believes that Cromwell would have made as good a Judge as Lord Hale ? No, sir ; these learned and accomplished men find their proper place under those who are fitted to command, and to command them among the rest. Such a man as Washington will say to a Jefferson, do you become my Secretary of State; to Hamilton, do you take charge of my purse, or that of the nation, which is the same thing; and to Knox, do you be my master of horse. Sir, all history shews this, but great diplomats and great scholars are, for that very reason, unfit to be rulers. Sir, would Hannibal have crossed the Alps when there were no roads—with elephants—in the face of the warlike and hardy mountaineers—and carried terror to the very gates of Rome, if his youth had been spent in poring over books? Would he have been able to maintain himself on the resources of his own genius for sixteen years in Italy, in spite of the faction and treachery in the Senate of Carthage, if he had been deep in conic sections and fluxions and the different calculus—to say nothing of botany, and mineralogy, and chemistry? “Are you not ashamed,” said a philosopher to one who was born to rule, “are you not ashamed to play so well upon the flute?” Sir, it was well put. There is much which it becomes a secondary man to know—much that it is necessary for him to know—that a first rate man ought to be ashamed to know. No head was ever clear and sound that was stuffed with book learning. You might as well attempt to fatten and strengthen a man by stuffing him with every variety and the greatest quantity of food. After all, the Chief must draw upon his subalterns for much that he does not know, and cannot perform himself. Sir, my friend Wm. B. Johnson has many a groom that can clean and dress a race horse, and ride him too, better than he can. But what of that? Sir, we are, in the European sense of the term, not a military People. We have no business for an army—it hangs as a dead weight upon the nation—officers and all. Sir, who rescued Braddock when he was fighting, secundum artem, and his men were dropping around him on every side? It was a Virginia Militia Major. He asserted in that crisis the place which properly belonged to him, and which he afterwards filled in the manner we all know.

Sir, I may, without any mock modesty, acknowledge what I feel, that I have made an unsuccessful reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. There are some subjects which I could have wished to have touched upon before I sit down now and forever. I had the materials in my possession when I came to this House this morning, but I am dragged down by physical weakness from the most advantageous use of them.

Sir, what shall we say to a gentleman, in this House or out of it, occupying a prominent station, and filling a large space in the eye of his native State, who should, with all the adroitness of a practised advocate, gloss over the acknowledged encroachments of the men in power, upon the fair construction of the Constitution, and then present the appalling picture, glaring and flaming, in his deepest colors, of a bloody military tyrant—a raw-head and bloody-bones—so that we cannot sleep in our beds—who should conjure up all the images that can scare children and frighten old women—I mean very old woman, sir—and who offers this wretched caricature—this vile daub, where brick dust stands for blood, like Peter Porcupine’s Bloody But, as a reason for his and our support in Virginia, of a man in whom he has no confidence, whom he damns with faint praise—and who, moreover—tell it not in Gath! had zealously, and elaborately, (I cannot say ably) justified every one of these very atrocious and bloody deeds—yes, sir, on paper—not in the heat of debate, in the transports of a speech, but—as the author of the Richmond Anathema full well knew—and knew that we, too, knew—deliberately and officially. Sir, if we did not know that Lawyers never see but one side of a case—that on which they are retained, and that they fondly hope that the Jury will see with their eyes—what should we say of such a man? His Client having no character, he attacks Defendant’s character, upon a string of charges, in every one of which (supposing them to be true) his client was self-avowed particeps criminis—having defended, adopted, and made each and every one of them his own. Sir, such a man may be a great Lawyer, (although this is but a poor specimen of his skill in that line) or a great Mathematician, or Chemist; but of a man guilty of such glaring absurdity, it may be fearlessly pronounced that, in the management of his own concerns, and in the affairs of men, he has not “right good common sense.” And here, sir, we come to that great and all-important distinction, which the profane vulgar—whether they be the great vulgar or the small—too often overlook; and which I have, lamely I fear, endeavored to press upon the House—I mean the distinction between knowledge and learning, on the one hand, and sense and judgment, on the other. And there, sir, lies the great defect of the gentleman in question. Sir, I have heard it said of him, by those who know and love him well, “that he can argue either side of a question, whether of law, of policy, or of constitutional construction, with great ingenuity and force; but he wants that sagacity in political affairs, which first discerns the proper end, and then adopts the most appropriate means: and he is deficient in that knowledge of mankind, which would enable another (much his inferior) to perceive that his honest disinterestedness is played upon by those who are conscious that he prides himself upon it. It is the lever by which he is on all occasions to be moved. It is his pride—an honest and honorable pride, which makes him delight to throw himself into minorities, because he enjoys more self-gratification from manifesting his independence of popular opinion—than he could derive from any thing in the gift of the People. His late production—the Adams convention manifesto, is the feeblest production of the day. The reason is, his head and heart did not go together.”

Sir, this picture is drawn by the hand of a friend. As we have had billiard tables and chess boards introduced into this debate, I hope I may be allowed to borrow an illustration from this last game. Sir, one of these arguing machines reminds me of the bishop at chess. The black or white bishop (I use the term not in reference to the color of the piece, but of that of the square he stands upon) is a serviceable piece enough in his way; but he labors under this defect: that, moving in the diagonal only, he can never get off his original color. He can scour away all over just one half of the board; but his adversary may be on the next square, and perfectly safe from his attack. To be safe from the bishop, you have only to move upon any one of the thirty-two squares that are forbidden ground to him. But not so the irregular knight, who, at successive leaps, can cover every square upon the board, to whose check the king can interpose no guard, but must move. Even the poor pawn has a privilege which the bishop has not: for he can elude his mitred adversary by moving from a white square to a black one, or from a black square to a white one, and finally reach the highest honors of the game. So even a poor peasant, of sense, may instruct the philosopher, as the shepherd did, in that beautiful introduction, the finest of Mr. Gay’s fables but one, who drew all his notions of men and things from Nature. Sir, it is in vain to turn over musty folios, and double down dog’s ears: it does very well in its place—in a lawyer’s office—or a bureau. I am forced to use the word for want of a better; but it will not supply the place of that which books never gave, and never can give—of judgment and experience. Sir, who would make the better leader, in a period of great public emergency—old Roger Sherman, or a certain very learned gentleman from New York, whom we once had here, who knew every thing in the world for which man has no occasion, and nothing in the world for which man has occasion? Sir, the People, who are always unsophisticated—and though they may occasionally be misled, are always right in their feelings, and always judge correctly in the long run—have taken up this thing. It is a notorious fact, in Virginia, that, in County Courts, where men are admitted to sit as judges, who are not of the legal profession—plain planters, who have no pretensions to be considered as lawyers—the decisions are much seldom reversed than in those courts where a barrister presides: his reasons may be more plausible, but his decision will be oftener wrong. Yes, sir, the People have decided upon this thing.

Sir, I will suppose a case: I will suppose that the late convulsive struggles of the Administration may so far succeed, as that they will be able to renew their lease for another four years. Now, sir, if a majority of this House can't get along with such a minority hanging on their rear, cutting off supplies, and beating up their quarters, what will be the situation of the Administration then? Sir, what is it now? Did any body ever hear of a victory obtained by the Executive power, while a decided majority of the Legislature was against it? Sir, I know of no such victory, but one—and that was the partricial victory of the younger Pitt over the Constitution of England; and he gained that only by the impenetrable obstinacy of the King, which then gave indications of the disease that was lurking in his constitution, and afterwards so unhappily became manifest.

Sir, the King was an honest man, and a much abler man than he ever had credit for. But he was incurably obstinate. He had just lost the colonies. No matter—he would risk the crown of England itself, and retire to his hereditary States in Germany, rather than yield: and, sir, but for a barefaced coalition, he would have so retired, and have supplied a most important defect in the act of settlement—the separation of Hanover from England. But the corrupt bargain of Lord North and Mr. Fox, to share office between them, disgusted the People—they took side even against their own liberties. But here, sir, the coalition is not on the side of the People's rights, but against them. Mr. Pitt, (the Crown rather) triumphed. Knaves cried Hosanna; and fools repeated the cry. England recovered by the elasticity which belongs to free institutions, and Mr. Pitt attained a degree of power that enabled him to plunge her into the mad vortex of war with Revolutionary France. Nine hundred millions of debt; taxes, in amount, in degree, and mode, unheard of; pauperism, misery, in all possible forms of wretchedness—attest the greatness of the Heaven-born Minister, who did not weather the storm, but was whelmed beneath it, leaving his country to that Providence whom it pleased to rescue her in her utmost need, by inflicting madness on her great unrelenting enemy, and sending this modern Nebuchadnezzar to grass. Sir, Mr. Pitt is as strong an instance for my purpose, as I could have wanted: He was a rhetorician, a speech maker; a man of words, and good words too, at will; a dextrous debater—and if he had continued to ride the Western circuit, he might have been an eminent wrangler at the bar, and, in due time, a Chief Justice or Lord Chancellor. But, for the sins of England he was made Prime Minister, and at five and twenty too. Sir, Mr. Pitt no more saw what was ahead of him, than the ideot in the Parish workhouse. He no more dream't, when the war began, to what point he would be able to push his system, if system it may be called, than any clerk in his office. The productive powers, of a People like the English, where property is perfectly secure and left free to act, and where the industrious classes are shut out from almost any participation in public affairs, is incredible; is almost without limit. Two individuals discovered two mines, more precious and productive than Guanaxiuto or Potosi—that furnished the means for his prodigality, that astonished even Mr. Pitt. These were Sir Richard Arkwright and Mr. Watt—the spinning machine and the steam engine. And this imbecile and blundering Minister has been complimented with what is due to the unrivalled ingenuity and industry of his countrymen. So, sir, in like manner, this young Hercules of America, who, if we can keep him from being strangled by the serpents of corruption, must grow to gigantic strength and stature—every improvement which he makes, in spite of the misrule of his governors, these very modestly arrogate to themselves.

We have been told, officially, that the President wished the great question to have been referred back to the People, if by the forms of the Constitution this could be done. Sir, if I were the friend, as I am the undisguised enemy of the Administration, I would say to them, you may be innocent—your intentions may be upright—but you have brought the country to that pass, that you can't carry on the Government. As gentlemen possessing the least self respect, you ought to retire—leave it—try another venue—you can't carry on the Government without us, any more than we can act, while every thing is the Executive Government is against us. Sir, there are cases in which suspicion is equivalent to proof—and not only equal to it; but more than equal to the most damning proof. There is not a husband here who will not ratify this declaration—there may be suspicion so agonizing, that it makes the wretch cry out for certainty as a relief from the most damning tortures. Such suspicions are entertained with respect to these gentlemen—and though they are making a convulsive effort to roll back the tide of public opinion, they can't allay the feeling—the suspicion rests upon the facts—and, do what they may, facts will not bend at their bidding. Admit it to be suspicion, it is equally fatal, as regards them and the public service, with the reality. Mr. R. would not go in pursuit of the alibis and aliases of the accused—of the tubs, whether with false bottoms or double bottoms, thrown out to amuse the public. The whole conduct of the accused had displayed nothing of the dignity of innocence; but all the restlessness of guilt. Every word of Mr. Clay's late pamphlet might be true, and yet the accused be guilty, notwithstanding.

The gentleman from Massachusetts warned us, that, if the individual we seek to elevate shall succeed, he will, in his turn, become the object of public pursuit, and that the same pack will be unkenelled at his heels, that have run his rival down. It may be so. I have no hesitation to say, that, if his conduct shall deserve it, and if I live, I shall be one of that pack; because, sir, I maintain the interests of Stockholders, against Presidents, Directors, and Cashiers. And here, sir, I beg leave to notice an objection urged, as I have heard, against me, by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE.] He says that I have been opposed to all Administrations. Sir, I deny it to be fact. I did oppose the elder Adams, because he attacked the liberty of the press and of the subject; because his opinions were at war with the genius of our institutions. He avowed them openly, and I liked him the better for his frankness. But, sir, I supported the Administration of his successor. I did for it what I could—little enough, God knows. The first case in which I differed from that Administration was the case of the Yazoo claims, which I thought a case of flagrant corruption. I do not mean, and I never did believe, that there was corruption in the President, or his two Secretaries; and it did not cause me to separate myself from them. I separated from that Administration three years afterwards, with pain and sorrow, and not without some anger, too; for, sir, I have no idea of that extreme of candor and meekness which denounces the measures of a Government, as Bottom says in the play, "and will roar you as gently as any sucking dove." It is not my nature to do so, and it would be criminal and ridiculous in me, because it would be hypocrisy to affect it. Sir, when the former restrictive system was first commenced, I thought I saw what I now know I did then see—the fatal and ruinous consequences that would grow out of it. I told Mr. Jefferson, candidly and frankly, that, if he expected support in a certain quarter, and did not find it, he need not blame me. Sir, I will not repeat what he said on that occasion, but he deplored the separation. But, permit me to remind you, sir—for you were then too young to know much of these matters—that, previously, but nearly at the same time of my leaving that Administration, a certain wise man from the East joined it, who soon after went off to Canada, under strong suspicion of felony; and this was soon followed by a certain gentleman's giving in his adhesion, who had before been violently opposed to it, and to all its best measures. Sir, I have not the least objection to its being said of me, that I separated myself from Mr. Jefferson, when Barnabas Bidwell and John Quincy Adams joined him.

Some allusion has been made to the discordant materials of the present Opposition. Sir, they are somewhat discordant—at least they have been so. But are they more so than the adherents of the present Administration, or the materials of the Administration itself? Sir, I will remember almost the first propitiation (the first was the writ of habeas corpus) which he who is now the President of the United States made to Mr. Jefferson and his party. It was an attempt to run down the present Chief Justice. The right of John Smith to a seat in the Senate was made the peg to hang it on. I will tell the gentleman the whole reason why I have opposed the Administration since that time, and may again, if, according to my judgment, they shall not consult the good of the country. It is, sir, simply because I am for the interests of the Stockholders—of whom I am one—as opposed to those of the President, Directors, and Cashiers; and I have the right of speaking my opinion, and shall exercise it, though it happen to be against the greatest and proudest names.

Sir, I am no judge of human motives: that is the attribute of the Name which I will not take in vain—the attribute of Him who rules in Heaven, or who becomes incarnate upon Earth—mere man can claim no such exemption.

I do not pretend that my own motives do not partake of their full share of the infirmity of our common nature—but of those infirmities, neither avarice nor ambition form one iota in the composition of my present motives. Sir, what can the country do for me? Poor as I am—for I am much poorer than I have been—impoverished by unwise legislation—I still have nearly as much as I know how to use—more, certainly than I have at all times made a good use of—and, as for power, what charms can it have for one like me? Sir, if power had been my object, I must have been less sagacious than my worst enemies have represented me to be, (unless, indeed, those who would have kindly shut me up in bedlam) if I had not obtained it. I may appeal to all my friends to say whether “there have not been times when I stood in such favor in the closet, that there must have been something very extravagant and unreasonable in my wishes, if they might not all have been gratified.” Was it office? What, sir, to drudge in your laboratories in the Departments, or to be at the tail of the corps diplomatique in Europe? Alas, sir, in my condition, a cup of cold water would be more acceptable. Sir, what can the country give me that I do not possess in the confidence of such constituents as no man ever had before? Sir, I could retire to my old patrimonial trees, where I might see the sun rise and set in peace. Sir, as I was returning, the other evening from the Capitol, I saw—what has been a rare sight here this winter—the sun dipping his broad disk among the trees behind those Virginia hills, not alighting his glowing axle in the steep Atlantic stream—and

I asked myself, if, with this Book of Nature unrolled before me, I was not the most foolish of men to be struggling and scuffling here, in this heated and impure atmosphere, where the play is not worth the candle; but then the truth rushed upon my mind, that I was, vainly, perhaps, but honestly, striving to uphold the liberties of the People who sent me here—yes, sir—for can those liberties co-exist with corruption? At the very worst, the question recurs, which will the more effectually destroy them, collusion, bargain, and corruption here, or a military despotism? When can that be established over us? Never, till the Congress has become odious and contemptible in the eyes of the People—Sir, I have learned from the highest of all authority, that the first step towards putting on incorruption is the putting off corruption. That recollection nerves me in the present contest; for I know that, if we succeed, I shall hold over the head of those who succeed the present incumbent, a rod, which they will not dare, even if they had the inclination, to disobey. They will tremble at the punishment of their predecessors. Sir, if we succeed, we shall restore the Constitution—we shall redress the injury done to the People—we shall regenerate the Country. If the Administration which ensues shall be as bad as the character of the opposing candidate (General Jackson) is represented by his bitterest foes to be, still I had rather it were in the seat of power than the present dynasty, because it will have been fairly elected. The fountain of its authority will not have been poisoned at the source. But, sir, if we perish under the spasmodic efforts of those now in power to reinstate themselves on the throne, our fate will be a sacred one—and who would wish to survive it?—there will be nothing left in the country worth any man's possession. If, after such an appeal as has been made to the People, and a majority has been brought into this and the other House of Congress, this Administration shall be able to triumph, it will prove that there is a rottenness in our institutions, which ought to render them unworthy of any man's regard—sir, my “churchyard cough” gives me the solemn warning, that, whatever part I shall take in the chase, I may fail of being in at the death—I should think myself the basest and the meanest of men—I care not what the opinion of the world might be—I should know myself to be a scoundrel, and should not care who else knew it, if I could permit any motive, connected with the division of the spoil, to mingle in this matter with my poor, but best exertions for the welfare of my country. If gentlemen suppose I am giving pledges, they are mistaken—I give none—they are entitled to none—and I give none. Sir, I shall retire upon my own resources—I will go back to the bosom of my constituents—to such constituents as man never had before, and never will have again—and I shall receive from them the only reward that I ever looked for, but the highest that man can receive—the universal expression of their approbation—of their thanks. I shall read it in their beaming faces—I shall feel it in their gratulating hands. The very children will climb around my knees to welcome me. And shall I give up them, and this? And for what? For the heartless amusements, and rapid pleasures, and tarnished honors, of this abode of splendid misery, and of shabby splendor? For a clerkship in the War Office, or a Foreign Mission, to dance attendance abroad, instead of at home—or even for a Department itself? Sir, thirty years make sad changes in man. When I first was honored with their confidence, I was a very young man, and my constituents stood in almost parental relation to me, and I received from them the indulgence of a beloved son. But the old patriarchs of that day have been gathered to their fathers—some adults remain, whom I look upon as my brethren; but the far greater part were children—little children—or have come into the world since my public life began. I know among them grandfathers, and men muster-free, who were boys at school, when I first took my seat in Congress. Time, the mighty reformer and innovator, has silently and slowly, but surely, changed the relation between us; and I now stand to them, in loco parentis, in the place of a father, and receive from them a truly filial reverence and regard. Yes, sir, they are my children—who resent, with the quick love of children, all my wrongs, real or supposed. To them I shall return, if we are defeated, for all of consolation that awaits me on this side of the grave. I feel that I hang to existence but by a single hair—that the sword of Damocles is suspended over me.

If we succeed, we shall have given a new lease to the life of the Constitution. But, should we fail, I warn gentlemen not to pour out their regrets on General Jackson. He will be the first to disclaim them. The object of our cause has been, not to raise Andrew Jackson to the Presidency—be his merits what they may—its object has been the signal and condign punishment of those public servants, on whom, if they be not guilty, the very strongest suspicion of guilt must ever justly rest.

[Mr. EVERETT here repelled the charge of having violated delicacy.]

I have a right to say so, when a man reads in this House a paper which is unfit to be read even without spectators. That he did not write it is no excuse for the gentleman. He read it, and he brought into view the case of the Queen of France.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1838.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, together with the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. BLAKE, as modified.

Mr. HAMILTON having taken the floor, submitted the following, as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. BLAKE:

“Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire, and report to this House, if any, and what, retrenchments can be made with safety to the public interest, in the number of the officers of the Government of the United States, and in the amount of salaries which they may respectively receive; more especially to report specifically on the following heads:

1. What reductions of expense can be made in the State Department, in the number and salaries of the officers and clerks attached to this Department, in the expenses regulating the foreign intercourse, and in the printing and distribution of the public laws of the United States.

2. What reductions in the Treasury Department, and whether an effective system of accountability, and for the collection of the public dues, is there established.

3. What reductions of expense can be made in the Navy Department in the clerks and officers now acting subordinately to the Secretary of the Navy.

4. What reductions of expense can be made in the Department of War, and in the Indian Department, and in the clerks and officers now acting subordinately to the Secretary of War.

4. What reductions of expense can be made in the number of officers, and the amount of compensation which they may receive, in the Postmaster General's Department.

And that the Committee be further instructed to examine the several contingent funds of each of these Departments, and to report the amount and objects for which disbursements have been made from these funds, and that they report the amounts, vouched and unvouched, which have been made from the Secret Service Fund, or the fund regulating the contingencies of Foreign Intercourse, and of the fund for the expenses of intercourse with the Barbary Powers.

And that they further report, whether the compensation of Members of Congress should be reduced; and whether the fixed salaries of the officers of this House, and its contingent expenses, can, with propriety, be diminished.

And further, That they inquire whether any modification of the sinking fund act can be made, with a view of producing a more speedy extinguishment of the public debt.”

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he rose to address the House with the most unaffected embarrassment; and whilst he was fully sensible of their kindness in the adjournment of last evening, he did not know that he ought to thank them for this indulgence, as it might have created expectations which he was destined to disappoint: for he could neither add novelty or attraction to the debate. If the House had permitted him to have remained in the possession of the floor on the last evening, he would probably then have contented himself with offering the amendment he had just presented. As it was, solaced by the same relaxation in which they had participated from the adjournment, he had acquired a stock of energy, which he feared he was about to expend in a tax upon their patience. He hoped, however, that he would be sensible that the only atonement he could make for their kindness, was to be as brief as possible, and to confine himself strictly to the matter in hand, and to a short notice of some of the topics which had been started on the other side.

He did not propose to add his unavailing regrets to those which had been generally expressed: that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] should have introduced his resolutions at this time. That gentleman had, with a frankness which was honorable to himself, avowed the motives which had influenced his conduct; and he, [Mr. H.] thought it no more than an act of justice, to absolve that gentleman from all responsibility for the latitude and inflammatory character which the debate had since assumed. But whilst I make this declaration, [said Mr. H.] I wish to accompany it with this distinct affirmation, that those with whom I act in this House, would not have selected this as an appropriate period for introducing the subject. My honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. RANKIN] at a single glance, with that perspicacity which distinguishes him, perceived the true bearings of this subject; he has said, this “is not the accepted time.” I will endeavor to follow out the reasons for this opinion, somewhat more in detail than they were offered by that gentleman himself. Whatever may be our majority in this House, we are not in possession of the Executive of this Government. It is against us; and I am not disposed to send missionaries and circumnavigators on a voyage of reform, when our adversaries are not only in possession of the ports, but their keys, forts, and arsenals. The anticipation, too, of their co-operation, would be visionary in the extreme, as, both in practice and doctrine, in the abstract and in the substance, they seem to be committed not to go either for retrenchment or reform. In reference to the doctrine of the Administration, he would refer to the first manifesto to which they had put on record—which was to be found in the memorable message of the President, of December, 1825. If it had been then desired by those who are in power to have carried into effect an intelligible system of national economy, this ground would then have been taken; and, instead of a few vague generalities on frugality, we should have pointed out, by definite land-marks, the course which the Administration desired, on this important subject, to pursue. But it so happens that this memorable paper, (more remarkable for the exuberance of its poetry than for the prosaic dullness of its statistics,) is filled with the most stupendous objects of extravagance. The imagination of the President seems to have been smitten with some beautiful image of magnificence which he desired to impress on the form of this Republic—more studious as to the objects to be obtained, than of the constitutional means of their accomplishment. He informs us, that “The spirit of improvement is abroad upon the earth. It stimulates the heart, and sharpens the faculties, not of our fellow-citizens alone, but of the nations of Europe, and of their rulers. While dwelling with pleasing satisfaction upon the superior excellence of our political institutions, let us not be unmindful that liberty is power; that the nation blessed with the largest portion of liberty, must, in proportion to its numbers, be the most powerful nation upon earth; and that the tenure of power by man is, in the moral purposes of his Creator, upon condition that it shall be exercised to ends of beneficence—to improve the condition of himself and his fellow men. While foreign nations, less blessed with that freedom which is power, than ourselves, are advancing with gigantic strides in the career of public improvement, were we to slumber in indolence, or fold up our arms, and proclaim to the world that we are palsied by the will of our constituents, would it not be to cast away the bounties of Providence, and doom ourselves to perpetual inferiority?”

It will be recollected that this is an instructive and emphatic conclusion to a long inventory of the most extravagant projects of expense, that the wit of man can conceive; that, after having clothed the surface of this empire with the embellishments of the arts, “elegant and profound,” he ascends into the seventh heaven of invention, and proposes studding the milky-way with luminaries, which have never come even under the charge of the venerable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NEWTON] under whose fostering superintendence all the other light-houses in the country have been built. When the exhortation which I have just read is taken in connexion with the assumption of the President, that we have the constitutional power to do all that he recommends; and, if we fail to exercise a power that is delegated to us, that it involves “a treachery to the most sacred of trusts,” although we might even “proclaim that we were palsied by the will of our constituents”—I say, from this doctrine, and the objects to which it is applied, we can have little hope of the cordial co-operation of this Administration, in any effectual scheme of retrenchment. But now let me appeal to facts. The Administration was in possession of a majority in this House, and in the other, for the two first sessions of their present term, and I ask any man to point out a single measure of retrenchment which has been accomplished by their friends, or even recommended by themselves. Sir, it is not the interest of those who came into power as did our present Executive, to diminish their patronage by retrenchment. At a former session, on a collateral branch of this subject (on a resolution of inquiry respecting the public printing) I maintained this position: that an Administration in a minority in the country, must rely, however hopeless the expectation, on the influence of its patronage, to sustain them in power. That this was the result of a moral destiny which they could not resist; that, having the People against them, they would have to depend upon that compact, effective, and well disciplined minority, of office-holders, and office-hunters: and that if, by a strange moral paradox, we can suppose Aristides himself could have consented to have taken the Presidency (which by the way, we cannot suppose) under the same circumstances that Mr. Adams accepted it, and Fabricius had been willing to become his Secretary of State, they must have indulged, by the force of an impulse little short of an instinct, in the same course of measures which had marked the useless, and, in the end, to themselves, hopeless, career of the Administration. To ask men thus situated to co-operate in diminishing their patronage, would be to ask them to give up the very element by which they hope to live.

I will, moreover, Mr. Speaker, very frankly confess that, believing, if the work of reform and retrenchment is necessary, it could be more effectually performed by a succeeding Administration, the friends with whom I act on this floor have not been insensible to the gratification they would feel if this task (judiciously accomplished) is destined to illustrate the glory of him whom we hope to see elevated to the Chief Magistracy of this country; because we believe, from the opinions which he expressed in the very infancy of his political life, and by all his subsequent habitudes, that he considers an enlightened frugality as one of the first virtues of a Republic. On this point, however, we do not desire to be mistaken. And here let it be understood, that I speak on the authority of a knowledge of his opinions, when I say, that, whilst he would be the unrelenting antagonist of every thing like corruption and abuse in the discretionary trusts of this Government, that the country has not a more zealous or inflexible friend than himself to all those establishments necessary to our prosperity in peace, and security in war; or one who would go farther, within the limits of the Constitution, to preserve to them every essential of usefulness and of undiminished vigor.

We therefore had no wish, as it surely was not our policy, at this time, to stir this matter. Believing that we stand on the vantage ground, that the great battle is going on elsewhere, much more effectually than it can be waged in this House, we desired, if such a course is permitted to us, to discharge the ordinary duties of legislation, and speedily to return to our homes, that the gratifying spectacle might have been presented, of the most popular deliberative body in our country discharging its high office, without participating in the excitement which surrounds it. Sir, we desired to provoke no war in this House, and we were in too good humor with the tokens of the times, to feel any inclination to indulge in acrimony or violence. But no sooner was the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHILTON] introduced, but the gentlemen occupying the ministerial benches (I hope they will pardon me the technical phrase—I do not use it in disparagement; but, as one of their organs [Mr. EVERETT] has repudiated the appellation of Adams-men, I know not what other term to use) seized upon it with avidity, as serving for a loop on which to hang popular harangues in defence of the Administration, and assaults upon their opponents. If they had permitted the resolutions to have shared the usual fate of most motions of inquiry in this House, they would have gone to the committee to which they were directed, and have either sunk into an uninterrupted slumber, or have been awakened possibly to some purpose of practical usefulness. But now, in a tone of defiance, these gentlemen challenge us to an inquiry, and, profiting by the example of their master spirit elsewhere, they seem inclined almost to go on the highway and advertise for an accuser.

Sir, we will not consent to become their accusers; we will make no charges, when they hold the keys of the very cabinets which contain the documentary proof, by which alone, if we did make accusations, we could hope to prove them. Sir, I have no idea of going on such an errand as to ask the honorable Secretaries to be so kind as to furnish us with the means of their own condemnation. I have no relish even for the sport of going to the Premier, of asking him to be so kind as to hold out his arm that we might feel his pulse, and see whether, from the fullness of the blood vessels, a little cupping and phlebotomy, in his opinion, might not be necessary; to inquire of him what he had done with his friends J. A. King and John H. Pleasants, and whether they, instructed by the great example of the palace, had made a revoke too, and had withdrawn the vouchers; or, sir, of crossing to the Treasury, and of thus accosting the Chancellor of the Exchequer: Well, Mr. Organizer General of the whole industry of the whole country, you who have kindly undertaken to take care of the business of every man, woman, and child, in our land, pray what have you done for the business of your own Department? Or, in stepping to the War Office, and of asking the son of Bellona, what brigades of reconnaissance he had now out—what political levels he had measured—what impediments he had surmounted—and whether, with a knowledge of projectiles greater than that of Vauban or Cohorne himself, he expected to engineer Mr. Adams into office for four years more? Or, lastly, of going over to the Navy Office, and to inquire of its chief, how many of his clerks were yellowed, and on the shelf? And whether some of his chaplains had not discovered the expansibility of human piety, and that it was quite as beneficial to pray a la distance for the cure of the souls of their flocks, as to pray with them.

In this crusade, the friends with whom I act in this House have no desire to indulge, or to carry with us a portable bill of indictment to each of the Departments. If we are to be made responsible for the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, we desire that these resolutions should retain their character of strict inquiry, devoid of every thing which wears the aspect of accusation, as we will not consent to go into the trial of the Administration on an issue, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. IZEMAN] has well said, made up by themselves, and, I say, upon proof only in their possession. If the Ministerial gentlemen, however, will pin us to the resolutions, and we must have an inquiry, let it be as full as possible; and, if it ends in no legislative results during the present Administration, it may terminate in an accumulation of useful facts, to govern the conduct of a future one. It is to meet this contingency that I have prepared the amendment which I have just offered—the true character and objects of which I will briefly disclose.

The amendment, in the first place, provides for the appointment of a Select Committee, by which alone the duty could be discharged, as the labor of its performance would be too oppressive for any one, or more than one, of the Standing Committees of this House. Besides, this provision will enable the Speaker to put upon this committee the disposable talent of this body, not engaged on the Standing Committees. Next, it will be perceived, that the amendment, steering clear of all accusatory matter, nevertheless covers the whole field of inquiry. It embraces the original resolution, with its amendments, and travels beyond them: it reaches every ramification of the fixed establishments of our Government, and all the discretionary trusts exercised under them, in a form analytically specific.

If, therefore, the gentlemen on the other side are in earnest, we invite them to work with us; if we do nothing this session, we may at least fix the blaze marks for the track of future legislation.

Having thus explained, sir, the character of the amendment, I should be induced to resume my seat, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] had not dropped, with an unsparing prodigality, in the debate of yesterday, several observations not calculated to limit its range, and which, from the weight of that gentleman, may be deemed worthy of notice. His argument was undoubtedly able in some parts, ingenious in others, eloquent in many, and artful in all. No man in this House understands the precepts of the great Roman master better than that gentleman, or practises on them more successfully. He has told him that artifice—I mean in no moral disparagement of the gentleman—is one of the higher excellencies of the persuasive art, and his speech of yesterday furnishes a practical commentary on the precept.

The gentleman began by a very minute and detailed history of the diplomatic legislation of the country, sufficiently long and oppressive to smother the real point at issue. Well, sir, what did he establish? Why, that certain discretionary funds, called contingencies for foreign intercourse, were, from the first establishment of the Government, vested in the President and Department of State. And who is prepared to dispute this? But does this touch the question yet in arrear, that these funds may be abused, and that just in proportion to the discretion conceded for their disbursement ought to be the vigilance of this House in its supervision of all those branches of the public service, which, from this very discretion, might be most liable to abuse and corruption? Because the items of expenditure from these funds are settled by certificate, and because the President has the power of directing, under his treaty-making power, these expenditures, the gentleman says, from a defect of constitutional authority in this House, we have no right to inquire what has become of the money. I have looked carefully, sir, into the instrument, and I cannot find either the immunity of impeccability for the Executive, or of prohibition to this House. On the contrary, I see nothing that impeaches the great moral and political power of this body, in superintending the public expenditures. The exercise of this power is unquestionably to be limited by those considerations which belong to the public policy of the country; and any inquiry under this power ought to be conducted with every possible regard to our foreign relations, that they might not be affected by indiscreet exposures. This would be abundantly secured by that reserve and confidence by which it is in our competence to seal the deliberations of this House.

The gentleman has entertained us with a history of the diplomatic services of Mr. Adams. I have no doubt of the authority as well as the authenticity of the narrative; I considered it as a piece of amusing and instructive autobiography. The gentleman, without doubt, thought that he was acting within the limits of a just retaliation, as the President's outfits had been drawn into this discussion—a circumstance which, for myself, I sincerely regret. The gentleman seems, however, to consider, that, whatever might be the amount of these outfits, double or treble, that the President furnished an adequate consideration for them, by his extraordinary personal influence with the Emperor of all the Russias. Sir, I am happy to hear that we have had a Minister abroad, with personal attractions so taking and irresistible. The gentleman informs us that it was mainly through this influence, that the mediation of that august Monarch was obtained with Great Britain, by which the blessings of Peace at Ghent were secured. I fear, from a letter which I have seen, written (I presume about that time) by Mr. Adams to a friend, that he might have been a little too anxious in relation to the exercise of this influence, and, as he informs his friend, that "our Government was too penurious" to prosecute a just and honorable war with success, and one half of our People sufficiently base to be sold, by their prejudices, to the enemy—[Mr. RANDOLPH here asked Mr. H. which half. Mr. HAMILTON replied, he presumed the Federal half]—that he might have pushed this matter a little too far with our great and good Ally. But will the gentleman pardon me for believing that the enemy had many more moving causes for the acceptance of the mediation, than those which he has disclosed? I am inclined to think that our battle at Chippewa and at Bridgewater, and the victories on Erie and Champlain, with the arrest of that trident of the Ocean our enemy had so long held in her firm grasp, by the achievements of Hull and Decatur, were much more successful negotiators than the personal fascinations and courtly graces of our Minister, and that the nerve and gunpowder of our warriors did quite as much as Mr. Adams could have accomplished with the seven hundred and fifty dollar coat, (about which we have heard so much) with even a bag and sword, however good a substitute the gentleman may think them for our bayonets and our broad swords.

The next subject to which the gentleman adverted, was the memorable narrative of the billiard table—first brought to the notice of the House by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON.] I do not believe that my friend, when he first noticed this item in the President's accounts, intended to make it a matter of grave accusation, as he certainly did not notice it with any very extraordinary emphasis. But the gentleman from Massachusetts very justly remarked, that the subject has since acquired a good deal of importance; and let me tell him why it has done so. It has been in consequence of the course which has been pursued in the auditing of this account. I am free to confess, that I never considered the mere fact of Mr. Adams having a billiard table in his House a serious matter, nor do I believe the people at large so considered it; but they merely deemed it one of those objects of expense, so strictly personal in its character, which a gentleman ought to have defrayed out of his private purse. I concur with my friend from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] in the pitifulness of the sum which was paid for this piece of furniture, and in the healthfulness of the game itself. I can very readily conceive, sir, in the depressing heats of summer, that the President and his good Premier, tired with the cares of State—jaded and harassed by unpleasant news from abroad, should find some consolation in this attractive game, and that, after pocketing their own balls in New-York, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and North-Carolina, they should find some sport in making a cannon on the red and white.

But, sir, I will venture to say this, that, in playing this game, if the Secretary of State is not influenced by the same courtesy which governed the courtiers of the great Frederick, never to beat the monarch at chess, that he could give the President twenty-nine, and, as they say in Kentucky, "row him up salt river."

The gentleman, however, says that the Government did not pay for this table. Has the gentleman told us the reason why it did not pay for it? Because, after the account was sent to this House, it challenged a criticism, by which the President could not have failed to be admonished of his error. Then a revoke was hazarded, and the item expunged. But, the gentleman desires to escape from this dilemma, by affirming that the Private Secretary of the President is an officer not known to this Government. Then, the President is to be considered as auditing his own account, and is responsible for the introduction of this item, and if he delegated this trust to an irresponsible officer, he was bound to have examined an account involving, as to other items, a large expenditure of the public money. I care not upon which horn of this difficulty the gentleman is hung—but he tells us, as trifling as this billiard table affair is, that it has done the Administration more harm than all the other accusations which have been brought against it. Let me tell him that this has not arisen from any severe moral reprobation, which the people were disposed to visit upon the innocent recreation of a game of hazard; for most of them like a game themselves. The gentleman has told us that the descendants of the Pilgrims—aye, even the descendants of the Pilgrims—who are, without doubt, the most moral people on earth—play billiards; and I sincerely hope, sir, they play a good game. But it was the littleness of this transaction—I hope the gentleman will pardon me, I mean no disrespect to the President; if he will furnish me, in the abundant knowledge of his own language, with a softer term, I will use it—I say it was the littleness, not the immorality of this transaction, that produced this excitement; in a word, it was because the President did not, in the first instance, pay for it out of his own purse, and that fact furnishes a solution of the whole effect which the gentleman so feelingly deploras.

But, the gentleman says, that through the unfortunate versions which have been given to this matter, the President has been represented as a corrupter of the youth of the country; and that his abode is little better than—a name which I will not follow his example in uttering. Depend upon it, in the anxiety of his friendship, this gentleman labors under a mistake. The people entertain no such false estimate of Mr. Adams's character. He has been the object, as a public man, of their searching criticism, for the last fifteen years. They know that he pays an exact regard to the proprieties of life, that he is a good husband, an unexceptionable parent, a useful citizen, and that he abhors a beggar as little as most men; but it is with his public virtues that the People have the highest concern. Oliver Cromwell said his prayers as often as Mr. Adams—swore as little—and was probably one of the most amiable men in England, in the private relations of life. These fireside virtues sometimes confer a dangerous authority and influence on the public faults—not to say vices—of a public man.

And the gentleman will pardon me, whilst I fully admit the morality of Mr. Adams's private life, that I should not consider it as furnishing a just compensation to his country, for the dangerous and seemingly interested inflexibility of his public principles. Let me tell that gentleman, that, while the People believe Mr. Adams to be a good man at home, they are inclined to think that he is disposed to play the game of ambition rather too rankly abroad. The gentleman has, however, solaced us with his opinion, that we have the ablest Cabinet this country has seen since the first Cabinet under General Washington. Comparisons, sir, are somewhat odious; and it is almost as great a breach of politeness to dispute a gentleman's taste. If that gentleman can find in the tremendous rhetorical explosions of the present Secretary of the Treasury, which I have seen in the public papers—that a wag has said, very facetiously, are more like setting the multiplication table to music than any thing else—if, I say, he can prefer these to the luminous expositions of Albert Gallatin, I shall not quarrel with his judgment; nor will I for setting a higher price upon the ability of the present Secretary of State, than upon that of James Madison. I know, sir, that Mr. Clay is a highly gifted man. As a popular declaimer on this floor, I presume he has scarcely ever had his equal. In the ability with which he filled that chair, in the parliamentary tact, and in the adroit management of this body, the joint result of intellect and fine social qualities, his power will never be forgotten. But let me say, that the very moment he went into the Department of State, this Sampson was not only shorn of his strength, but of something infinitely more valuable. I will not continue this part of the discussion: not a single harsh term shall now escape me. If the victory is ours, it is not over his blighted fortunes that I shall find my triumph, however just the destiny that awaits him.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] after having himself, in some degree, widened the theatre of hostility, exclaims—let us have done with this exterminating war—let us have peace and tranquillity. Will the gentleman permit me to tell him how this may be accomplished? Let the Administration abdicate, and he and his friends shall have a plenty of peace, and no persecution. But he is exceedingly philosophical and benevolent. He exclaims, whilst his friends are in possession of the power, which we believe the People intended for ours, for God's sake, hands off; let us keep what we have got ; remember you are expending by your violence "the moral wealth of the country." Let me say that this is a treasure, of which many people carry but a small amount, even for current change, in their pockets, and, in spite of the immense expense of this fund, we shall continue to war with him and his friends, within just and honorable limits, until we conquer, or are beaten. When the People have settled this contest, the gentleman may be gratified with a pacification, as halcyon as the benevolent harmony of his own feelings. The gentleman, however, has subjected the presumption of our hopes, the eagerness of our expected triumph, to a severe chastisement. He has told us, that, after our huntsman had hunted down the game, he will find some of the hounds at his own throat. Sir, we are content to take the hazard, and are not alarmed by the fate of Actæon. We believe, if this distinguished citizen, who is emphatically the candidate of the People, reaches the first office within their gift, that, coming into power backed by that moral energy which arises from the fact of his being really their choice, with clean hands and a pure heart, riding on no political stalk horse, with the ambition of no family dynasty to cater for, and no pledged succession to support, but honestly intending to do his duty, by the assistance of a sagacious understanding and an intrepid heart, he may fearlessly throw himself upon the justice, the generosity, and gratitude, of his country, and defy the worst hostility of his enemies. And let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, even if the great Western hunter, the master spirit of the battle, on his side, should, after our victory, wind his horn, which, like the blast of Roderick Dhu, "is worth a thousand men," he might blow it until he broke a blood vessel, and there would not be a single cur found in his pack, who, starting from the kennel, could jump knee-high towards that throat which is threatened with their puny vengeance. Let me also say to him, that, to a man who fairly obtains power, intends honestly to use, and justly deserves it, the press has no terrors ; its distempered exhalations may arise, and seem, for a moment, to obscure that brightness, which is at last destined to settle in eternal sunshine. God forbid that it should be otherwise. After fretting out a feverish existence in this world, the destiny of man would be miserable indeed, if the sting of the scorpion and adder was to be perpetual ; if there was "no bright reversion," by which the moral judgment, even of an early posterity, should correct the injustice of a contemporary age.

But I have sufficiently trespassed on the patience of the House. Let me, before I sit down, make one appeal to the friends with whom I act ; let us, before we adjourn, put this matter to rest, by coercing the question—that Monday may not, indeed, be black Monday, but bright Monday, by our turning over a new leaf, despatching the public business, and by preparing speedily to go to our own homes.

Mr. SERGEANT said, he should be sorry to have it known how much difficulty he had had, to overcome the repugnance he felt, to make any demand upon the time and attention of the House in this debate. If known to others, to the extent he had felt it himself, he was afraid it would be deemed an absolute weakness. He had been for some time, he said, out of the House. Great changes had taken place in its composition during that period. There were many members to whom he was a stranger. It seemed to him, also, that there was a change in the kind of demand they made on each other. Nothing appeared to him likely to engage the attention of the House—judging from what he had witnessed—unless it was piquant, highly seasoned, and pointed with individual and personal allusion. For this, he was neither prepared nor qualified. He would take up as little time as possible, and, as far as he could, would avoid all topics that were likely to irritate and inflame. He would not here treat of the great question which agitates the People of this nation, and upon which, as one of the People, he had a decided opinion. If touched at all, it would be incidentally, as the natural consequence of remarks upon the subject before the House, and of the facts he should have to state, and not as a principal point.

It was one thing, he said, to offer a resolution like that under consideration, and another to vote upon it after it had been offered. The gentleman from Kentucky, he hoped, would consider him as speaking with entire respect for his motives and views. But, for himself, he must say, that he (Mr. S.) would not have offered the resolution ; yet, being brought forward, he would not vote to lay it upon the table, nor to make any other disposition of it, that would prevent the proposed inquiry from having a full discussion and free course. The reasons for both these conclusions appeared to him to be perfectly satisfactory.

He would not, he said, have proposed such a resolution, because he thought it must be unavailing. It was too extensive for any practical purpose—it aimed at too much. It embraced the whole business of Congress. It was our duty, he said, to take care that the public affairs were carried on, in the most profitable manner for the People, and with the least public burthen. And this was not peculiarly the duty of Congress at any one time, but at all times. It was the great end and object of our labors and our care, and ought to be of daily application by all of us. He thought it too much, to devolve upon a single committee the whole of that which was the common concern and care of Congress.

He thought it unnecessary. Every inquiry proposed by this resolution, was already provided for, in accordance with the duty of the House, by the appointment of Committees, to give effect to the great guards of the constitution, within their respective spheres: No money can be drawn from the Treasury, but in pursuance of appropriations made by law. No officer can be appointed, but under the authority of the constitution or the laws. No salary can be affixed to an office, but by the same warrant. The Committee of Ways and Means—a standing committee of the House—acts upon estimates furnished by every department of the Government. When called upon to report appropriations, they compare these estimates with existing laws and existing exigencies, and report only such as are justified by law. When they report the appropriation bills, each item of them is subject to the revision of every member of this House. The annual appropriation bill brings every thing under review. The House itself is to examine in detail, and see that all is in conformity with the law. Have we not, too, Committees on the expenditure of each Department ? And a Committee on the Public Expenditures, to make a biennial examination, and see that the moneys have been faithfully applied, according to the appropriations, and fully accounted for ? He would not speak at present of the manner in which Congress makes appropriations, nor how they are to be accounted for, particularly the contingent fund of this House, or of any of the Departments. But he would say this—if there be any appointment not authorized by law, or any salary paid, which the law does not authorize, let the specific abuse be pointed out and traced to its source, so that the offence and the offender may be known. He knew of none such.

There was still another reason why he should not have brought forward such a resolution—he spoke sincerely, and, after listening to this debate, as well as making some examination for himself—there was no basis laid for the resolution, as there ought to be, by shewing that there was abuse or extravagant expenditure, or such a state of things as rendered a general inquiry necessary, either for the purpose of immediate correction, or, as had been intimated, to procure materials for a more propitious moment. The structure of this Government was not the work of a day. He did not speak of the Constitution, but of the fabric which had been constructed under the Constitution, for effectuating its great purposes. It had not been built up at one time, but by successive and continued exertions of successive Legislatures. It was not the work of one party, but of all the parties which had existed in the United States. Begun by one, extended and enlarged by another; at one time, perhaps, carried too far, and then somewhat reduced, so as to adapt it to the state of the country. But, in such reduction, always following the only course that can lead to any practical result—that of examining it item by item, and piece by piece. It was not now the possession of one set of men, nor of one party, but of the whole People of the United States, by whose immediate Representatives it had thus been constructed. The Legislature was created by the Constitution—its pay and expenses are regulated by itself. The Executive, too, was established by the Constitution. The subordinate officers have been created by Congress, and increased according to the growing wants of this expanding nation. Their pay and emoluments also have been fixed by Congress. Even the number of Clerks in each Department, and the pay of every Clerk, is regulated and ascertained by law. It had, indeed, been remarked by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] that the contingent expenses of this House had increased in a much greater ratio than its numbers; that, in twenty years, the numbers of the members had only doubled, and the expenses were nearly quadrupled. This matter is entirely under the regulation of the House. If the expense be too great, let it be checked and controlled, by limiting, if it be possible, those branches of service which occasion the expense. But he did not believe the numerical argument precisely correct, or that, in this case, 2 and 2 would necessarily only make 4. When it was considered that this Confederation now embraced twenty-four States, and three Territories; when we considered the extent of the country, and the space through which information was to be diffused; he thought it would be a great error to suppose that the expenses would increase only according to the increase of the number of Representatives. He rather thought, that, like the price of plate, glass, or diamonds, they would increase in somewhat of a geometrical ratio. The greater part of the expense, however, it was obvious, was incurred for the purpose of giving information, and this was an object of too much importance to be sacrificed for the purpose of saving expense.

The establishments of the country had been formed in the same way—the Army, the Navy, the foreign intercourse. On what basis do they stand? Each on the footing upon which it has been deliberately placed by Congress, after carefully considering what the public service required, and what they were respectively worth. There may have been error—nothing human is exempt from liability to error. Sometimes, however, it is imputed with unjust severity. But, if there be error, let it be pointed out, examined, and corrected. There let the wisdom of Congress apply the remedy, at the point where the evil exists.

There was an additional reason why he would not have offered such a resolution, and especially at the present moment. He would state it freely. At the same time, he thought it proper to say, that he had no doubt the resolution was fairly and honestly meant, and for the direct purpose which the mover himself had stated. He (the mover) thought, and some of his constituents thought, that there were points in which reform was necessary, and that they might be embraced by a general inquiry. But his, (Mr. S's) objection to himself bringing forward such a resolution, was this: a general allegation of extravagance and abuse, such as the resolution seems to imply, cannot be accurately and satisfactorily met. It is impossible, whatever may be the fact, to give it a demonstrative refutation, because it presents no specific subject for discussion. It may do harm: it is calculated to spread abroad an opinion that abuse and extravagance exist, and are allowed here, at the Seat of Government, under the very eye of Congress. It was calculated to weaken the attachment of the People to the Government—not to the Administration—he did not mean that—not to this set of men in power, or to that set of men—but to the Government itself; and to give point to an inquiry he had seen in a newspaper with great regret—of what advantage or use is this Government to the People?—This is especially the case where the allegation includes ourselves.

There was one part of the resolution to which he had the strongest repugnance as a subject of discussion. He never had discussed it, and he did not think he ever would. He referred to the inquiry about our own pay. The amount of the pay of members of Congress has never been altered but once since the adoption of the Constitution. [Mr. RANDOLPH—Twice.] Twice altered the mode of compensation, the amount but once. The per diem now allowed was intended to be about equal in substance (he had no exact calculation) to the per annum allowed by the compensation law. Two dollars a day, and no more, had been added to the pay fixed at the organization of the Government. This could not be deemed an extravagant or exorbitant addition. He looked back, he said, to the period of that law (compensation law) with great regret. Not that he thought the per annum compensation injurious in principle, or wrong in amount, but he regretted extremely that the public mind should have been agitated as it was by such a question. He would rather have forgone any advantage to himself. No: the advantage was not worth estimating—he would rather have forgone the whole pay for the time, than have been instrumental in furnishing such a cause for regret.

Dismissing this subject of the pay of the members, (always accompanied with unpleasant feelings,) he said he was, on general grounds, prepared to believe, from some examination, that the suggestion of extravagance or abuse, and the consequent necessity of reform, as applied to this House, to the Executive Departments, or to any branch of the service, was not supported. He did not mean to say that there was no useless office. But there was no proof, nor reason to believe, that there is any such office. Nor would he say that there was no useless expenditure. But he would say that he knew of none, and in this debate none had been designated. As all the offices are created by the Constitution, or by act of Congress, as even the clerks are numbered and their salaries fixed, and both were in the power of Congress, he could not suppose, until some ground for the belief had previously been laid, that there was in these particulars extravagance or abuse.

On the contrary, he said, there was the strongest general evidence of a wise and economical administration of the affairs of this country. He did not mean the present administration merely—he meant the Government in general, giving to the present administration their just portion of credit. As far as they were concerned, they were entitled to the praise of fairly contributing to give effect to a wise system of economy. Much of the merit belonged to Congress.

Matters of revenue and expenditure, necessarily sounded in figures. He would not contradict those who seemed to think that even figures might deceive; but he would say that he did not know how such a subject could be understood without resorting to them. It was a matter of calculation, after all; and nothing but calculation, however tedious the process, would lead to sure results. He did not intend to restrict himself, in this inquiry, to the term of the present administration. Beginning with the peace, when the nation was liberated from the extraordinary demands of war, he would embrace the whole period of the last administration, (which one gentleman had said he thought was wasteful and prodigal,) and as much of the time of the present administration as had already expired, in order to show that there had been, and still continued to be, a wise and economical management of the affairs of the country. What had been accomplished during that period?

From the Treasury report of 1816, it appears that the public debt was then estimated (30th September, 1815) at

$119,635,558 46

"Subject," the report adds, "to considerable changes and additions," estimated at 7,000,000, 00

Making a total of $126,635,558 46

There were, besides, large floating claims growing out of the war, for which Congress has been obliged, from time to time, to make provision. The public debt, therefore, in January, 1816, was, in round numbers, one hundred and twenty-six millions and a half of dollars. What is it now? Nominally, sixty-seven millions. But, of this aggregate, seven millions were the subscription to the Bank of the United States, for which we have the same amount in stock of equal or of greater value. Deduct that sum, and the total debt is but sixty millions. So that, during the period of about twelve years, beginning immediately after the war, there has been an extinguishment of debt to the amount of rather more than sixty-six millions. But this is not all. There has been created, during the same time, a debt of five millions of dollars to purchase Florida—that is, to pay the claims of our own citizens, stipulated by the treaty with Spain to be paid as the price of that purchase. This sum being added, as it ought to be, there is an aggregate of seventy-one millions, or nearly six millions of dollars a year, during the whole of that period, besides paying the interest of the debt, the expenses of the Government, and making liberal provisions for the public service. This is something. But much more had been done. For what he was about to say, he referred to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means in the year 1816. At the head of that committee was a gentleman who could not be remembered without feelings of deep regret at the public loss sustained by his early death. He possessed, in an uncommon degree, the confidence of this House, and he well deserved it. With so much knowledge, and with powers which enabled him to delight and to instruct the House, there was united so much gentleness and kindness, and such real unaffected modesty, that you were already prepared to be subdued before he exerted his commanding powers of argument. He spoke, he said, of the public loss. As to the individual himself, (the late William Lowndes, of South Carolina,) he had lived long enough to acquire the best possible reputation—a reputation earned by a well-spent life. But to return to the immediate subject. It appeared from the report, that, at the period referred to, (1816,) there was a direct tax of more than five millions and an half; there were internal taxes, consisting of licenses to distillers, tax on carriages, licenses to retailers, auction duties, tax on furniture, on manufactures, excise on distilled spirits, and increased postage, to the amount of seven millions, making an aggregate of more than twelve millions and an half of dollars. From all this weight of burthen the People of this country had been relieved. Above twelve millions and an half of revenue had been surrendered. Yet the interest of the public debt, amounting, at the beginning of the period, to more than six millions of dollars per annum, had been duly paid; the claims growing out of the war, of very large amount, had been paid; the Army establishment supported; the Navy maintained and augmented; a system of fortifications established and prosecuted, commensurate with the wants of the country; the claims under the treaty with Spain had been satisfied; the regular operations of the Government carried on; and, besides occasional appropriations by Congress, a permanent provision (a heavy draught on the Treasury, but well applied) had been made for adding to the comforts of the declining years of the veterans of the Revolution. Something, not inconsiderable, too, had been done in internal improvement. And, during the same period, as he had already stated, seventy millions had been paid off of the principal of the public debt. Of this amount, he thought it proper to add, more than sixteen millions (principal of the public debt) had been paid during the present administration.

A Government which has effected this, he said, would seem to be entitled to the praise of being wise and economical, at least until the contrary appeared by some proof of extravagance. And what is our position now? There is no internal tax—no direct burthen—the expenses of our Government are entirely defrayed by the indirect taxation of the customs. We are in the full enjoyment of civil, religious, and political liberty, to an extent without example; and last, not least, there is as much abstinence on the part of the Government, in the exercise of its powers over individuals, as can possibly be observed: much greater than any known Government ever did, or now does observe. We enjoy under it ample protection, and yet we never feel its pressure. We know of its existence only by the benefits it confers.

Out of the income and revenue of the country, ten millions a year are irrevocably destined as a sinking fund, to extinguish the public debt. The process is rapidly going on. He would not repeat the accurate and satisfactory statement which had been made by his colleague [Mr. STEWART.] The annual appropriation is more than sufficient to pay off the debt at the periods when, by the terms of the several loans, it is redeemable. The whole may be paid off in the year 1835, and a large surplus accumulated in the Treasury. After that period, the present revenue will exceed, by at least ten millions of dollars, the wants of the Government, and may be accordingly reduced. Such is our condition, and such our prospects.

But there is other proof, more precise, and in some respects, more satisfactory, upon this point of wise economy. What are the total expenditures of the Government, the public debt included? Let us take the year 1826. It affords a better basis than the year just ended, because it is all matter of exact knowledge, and no part estimated. The whole expenditure is about twenty-four millions of dollars. The population of the United States at the present moment is not exactly known. But, upon the lowest estimate, that can be reasonably formed, this expenditure is less than two dollars for each individual composing it. How then can it be supposed, as it seemed to be by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLORIN] that the comparison with other countries would be disadvantageous to us? There is no comparison in the case. Take the Government of England, for example. The taxation there, according to the latest statement I have seen, taking an average of five years, ending in 1823, is no less than fifty-three millions sterling, and the parochial taxes are stated at seven millions more, making a total of sixty millions. This is equal to three pounds sterling a head of the whole population, or, at the present rate of exchange, fifteen dollars a head. But he understood the member from Virginia [Mr. FLORIN] to say, that we must add the expense of our State Governments and local charges, and, these being added, our Government would appear to be an expensive one. In the state which he [Mr. S.] had the honor in part to represent, there were no taxes for the support of Government. The only State taxes existing were some which had been recently imposed, for the purpose of carrying on a great system of beneficial improvement, which could not with any propriety enter into the calculation. The proper expenses of the State Government did not, according to his recollection—he spoke merely from memory—exceed ten or fifteen cents for each of the People. As to local charges of various kinds, it would be sufficient to say, that, if they were to be added on one side, they must also, for the purpose of comparison, be added on the other. They existed every where. If we pay in our cities and towns for paving, lighting and cleansing, are they exempt from similar charges in England? If we pay for water, do not they pay too? These charges are, in fact, only equivalents for comforts we obtain, and which are better and more cheaply obtained by common contribution. No one is exempt from them. He who lives in the country must either forego these things (some of them he cannot dispense with) or procure them at his own expense. He must sink his own well to get water, and it will cost him more. He must go unlighted in the dark, or he must carry his own light. He must make his own path. If he come to a place where he cannot put down his foot, he must himself lay down a log or a stone to step upon. He repeated, therefore, that these charges, local ones, were only equivalents for comforts which could not be to cheaply had in any other way. They were no part of the present calculation. He then said this was far the cheapest Government—it made less exactions of any sort from the citizen. This was a fair ground for presuming that it was not wasteful or extravagant.

Now, Sir, said he, let us see how this annual expenditure is distributed. That will be coming nearer to the very point in question, and will afford satisfactory information. The total expenditure, rejecting fractions, was twenty-four millions. Of this amount, nearly one half, that is, eleven millions, were applied to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt. For the military establishment, including fortifications and military pensions six millions two hundred thousand dollars. For the navy, four millions two hundred thousand dollars. All these are expenditures necessary for carrying into effect laws made upon deliberate consideration, and they will continue to be necessary until Congress, upon the same deliberation, shall think proper to reduce these establishments, or, (which will speedily arrive,) the public debt shall be paid off. When that day comes, the necessary expenditure, and of course the requisite revenue, will be reduced nearly one half. For the civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenditure of the Government, it appears, therefore, that there is left only about two millions six hundred thousand dollars, or a little more than one-tenth part of the whole expenditure.

This expenditure, of a little more than two millions and a half of dollars, or rather more than one-tenth of the whole expenditure, provides for the following objects: The whole of the Legislature of this Union of twenty-four States, contingent expenses included: the whole of the Executive, including the State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments: the expenses of the Post Office Department, covering a greater extent of territory, and diffusing a greater amount of accommodation, than any other known establishment of that kind: the surveying of the Public Lands: the Mint establishment of the United States: the Governments of three Territories: the whole Judiciary of the United States: The light-house establishment: The whole of the expenses of our foreign intercourse, and some miscellaneous items, which, not belonging properly to any other head, are placed under this.

Is it not rather amazing, that a Government, extending over twenty-four States and three Territories, embracing so large a space, and so great a population, and providing adequately for all, should be carried on at so small an expense? In other parts of the world, it would scarcely be credited. It does the highest honor to the Government, Congress included. It seems to me to show, most satisfactorily, that the Government, instituted by the People, and for the People, has, up to this moment, been true to its appropriate and characteristic principle, of promoting the public welfare—and that instead of being surrounded, as some have appeared to imagine, by extravagance and abuses, we are still in the pure days of the Republic. If, hereafter, abuses should occur; if corruption should grow up, and our institutions be perverted or overthrown, the patriot—for even then there will be patriots—will look back to our time with mingled admiration and regret, as a portion of the happy and honest period of our history.

He said he had been very much struck with a remark made by a gentleman, whom he was obliged to designate as one of the Opposition—that this was not a favorable time for retrenchment. If retrenchment were necessary, he [Mr. S.] thought that there could be no more favorable time. The People could never have higher security than they now have. For we are sure that this Administration will be closely watched, and that no error, however slight, will be left undetected and unexposed. There is the most unceasing vigilance. There has not been, there will not be, a single particular, that will escape the watchful attention of Congress. He did not mean to say that its vigilance ever slumbered. But, assuredly, it can never be more wide awake and active than when stimulated, as it now is, by the feelings which are admitted to exist. There is all the ordinary vigilance and something more. How then can abuse, always obnoxious to the censure of Congress, hope, at this time particularly, to escape examination and exposure? How can it be believed that it has so escaped?

These were some of the reasons why he would not have felt himself bound to offer such a resolution. They were not reasons for opposing it when offered by another, but rather for giving it the fullest and freest course. If, in any quarter of the country, there is an impression of extravagance or abuse, let it be removed. If, said he, any member of this House desires to institute a general inquiry, however unpromising I may think it on account of its aiming at too much, I, for one, will not withhold from him the opportunity, though the mere inquiry seems to imply a censure upon the Government or upon some branch of it. Such an investigation is a very weighty one. It requires a careful examination of the whole structure of the Government, and of all its parts. But I cannot agree with the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from South Carolina, that it requires the cordial co-operation of the Executive, nor any co-operation at all. The gentleman from South Carolina who last addressed the House, [Mr. HAMILTON] says the keys of the Treasury are in the hands of the Executive, and he speaks of the Executive as occupying a fortress inaccessible to us without his leave. Sir, the keys of the Treasury are in the hands of this House, lodged there by the Constitution. The keys of every Department are in the hands of this House. Not an avenue, part, or place, in the Government, that is not open to us, when we command it to be open. We have an unlimited power to enter, examine, and inquire. We are not obliged to trust to what any one may tell us, nor to adopt the representation of any Head of a Department. I acknowledge—and if the Administration were to be changed to-morrow, I would make the same acknowledgment—I do acknowledge that one concession ought, in my opinion, to be made—a very humble concession, indeed, to a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and to the elevated character of the men who fill those elevated places—the concession that we may rely upon the truth of what they tell us, in matters of fact. As to opinion, we can form it for ourselves. Less than this cannot be supposed or conceded.

There were other reasons, he said, why he had not voted to lay the resolution upon the table, and would not do so. Such a vote might be interpreted into evidence of a disposition to prevent inquiry. But, especially, he could not consent to such a vote, when the motion was accompanied with a remark, often since repeated as the ground of it, that this was not the time for inquiry, retrenchment, or reform. What does this argument amount to? What does it mean? It means, I suppose, what others have said—that it is not a propitious moment; that we cannot expect a “cordial co-operation” on the part of the Executive; it is pointed, therefore, directly at the present Executive; it is a charge of a serious nature, calculated to prejudice the Executive in the estimation of the People, and to bear upon the pending election of President, to the injury of one of the candidates. He could not give it his sanction, because he knew nothing to warrant it. If reform and retrenchment were proper and necessary, he believed the present Executive would give us his aid as cheerfully and as effectually as any we could have.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMILTON] has very frankly given another version to the suggestion that this is not the time. He would be willing now to collect materials for reform and retrenchment, but he would not be willing now to make reform or retrenchment. And why? Because he did not wish to give the merit of such a work to the present Administration, but to reserve it for a future Administration. This is candid, undoubtedly, but it is unsound doctrine. The gentleman from South Carolina will be obliged, upon reflection, to abandon it. Is it consistent with the duty we owe to the People, to postpone the reform of abuses, if we really believe it necessary, in order that we may strip one Administration of the merit, and bestow the grace of it upon another? Is it not our first duty to do what is required for promoting the public welfare, and to do it at the time when it is required? Can we justify ourselves in delaying it for any consideration whatever, much less for such an one as that which had been stated? He thought not. It would be entirely at variance with every notion he had of the proper functions of Congress. He would therefore say, that, so far as the motion to lay upon the table was calculated to do injury to the present Administration, he was opposed to it upon that ground. And with this declaration, he was sure the gentleman from South Carolina was too candid to find any fault. So far as such a motion was calculated to prevent or to retard inquiry or reform, or had the appearance of being so calculated, he was opposed to it, because he would not willingly place any obstruction in the way.

He said he was not going to enter into the contest of crimination and recrimination which had been carried on here. He felt himself entirely unfit for it. Some topics, however, had been introduced, having something of a specific shape, upon which he would trouble the House with a few observations. The diplomatic intercourse of the country has been charged with extravagance and mismanagement; and with what may perhaps be termed want of taste in its style. He understood a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLORN] to contend, that the whole character of our foreign intercourse ought to be changed. If the allowance to our Ministers was too low, he [Mr. FLORN] would agree to raise it; but they should come home when the business was done. There should be no permanent missions in other countries—no Ministers remaining abroad. This, said Mr. S., would be an entire change of the system acted upon by the Government ever since its foundation. It ought not to be adopted without being thoroughly considered. He would appeal, then, to the House, whether, in the present state of the world, any civilized Nation was at liberty to withhold, or refuse the ordinary and established duties of courtesy and hospitality? If she claim to be of the family of civilized nations, and wish to maintain the relations of peace and commerce, is it in her power to withdraw herself from associating with them upon the terms, and in the manner, which the common convenience has settled? An individual may shut himself up in his house—may refuse to visit—may determine that he will neither give nor receive invitations: if he do, it will not only be at the expense of much innocent gratification to himself, and at the expense, too, of many great advantages to himself, but it will be a positive injury and wrong to society; for, as far as his example goes, it must, if adopted, cut up society by the roots. It is the same with nations. No one can shut herself up. It has been the policy of this nation, from the beginning, to perform her part in this system of mutual and friendly intercourse. Ay, sir, said he, and let it be remembered, that one of the first and highest gratifications this country ever received, was the reception of her Minister at the Court of France—an act which publicly owned her as one of the family of Independent Nations, and increased her moral power both at home and abroad. If the system is to be changed, Congress must do it. As long as it continues, the duty of the Executive is to give it effect; and no blame can attach to the Administration for executing the provisions of the Constitution and the law.

It was true, he said, that, within a few years past, our diplomatic intercourse had been extended, and its expenses increased. The family of nations had been enlarged by the interesting addition of the new States of this hemisphere. It was, in every view, particularly interesting to us. They were new, near, and valuable neighbors, with whom we must have relations, and with whom there could be no doubt it was desirable that these should be the relations of peace, of friendship, and mutual good understanding. Upon this point, the People of the United States were in advance of Congress—he did not speak hastily—the public sentiment was in advance of Congress, and Congress was in advance of the Executive. The missions were not instituted, until this House, by a resolution, passed with almost unexampled unanimity—(but one member voted against it, a gentleman from Virginia, not now a member,)—until this House, stimulating the Executive to open the intercourse, pledged itself to support him in the measure, and offered a liberal provision for the expense. There has been no expression since of a wish to abandon or to limit that intercourse. Whatever may be the expense of those missions to the new States, all who read the newspapers, and know any thing of the nature of our commercial intercourse with them—all who know how they are solicited, courted, and caressed, by the European Powers, and the struggle that is carried on for their favor—to say nothing of other and more general considerations—will see the importance of cultivating good feelings, and maintaining a good correspondence with them; and that we cannot neglect these things, without risking the loss of valuable advantages. His own clear opinion was, that we ought to omit no fair exertions to preserve them, and that the missions ought to be maintained. He thought them of the greatest consequence.

Remarks had been made upon the style of our foreign Ministers, their dress particularly. Why, said the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FLORN] not let him appear with the simplicity of Franklin and Livingston? The House would excuse a word in reply. He [Mr. S.] knew nothing of the simplicity of Mr. Livingston. That gentleman was not near to the time of Franklin. He was appointed to France soon after Mr. Jefferson became President, he believed in 1801. But this he did know, from the best information, that he was a gentleman of large fortune, and liberal disposition, accustomed every where to a liberal way of life, and that the liberality of his style of living in France, was such as most materially, as he had understood, to encroach upon, and reduce his private fortune. In what dress he appeared at Court, he could not say; but he took it for granted he accommodated himself in that respect to the fashion of the Court. As to Franklin, he said, consider the circumstances under which he appeared in France. The Representative of a young Republic, just come into existence, and in its very cradle exhibiting Herculean strength, by maintaining, single-handed, a contest for its independence with one of the strongest nations that existed; attracting the earnest attention of the whole civilized world, and especially engaging the attention and the good wishes of France, because the contest was with her habitual enemy, and promised to diminish his power. When a nation, so circumstanced, shall have a Franklin for her Envoy, I do not believe it will be very material to inquire what dress he wears. To that state we shall never return. And, I may be allowed to add, we have not Franklins to send. He carried with him the fruits of more than seventy years, devoted, with the aid of extraordinary natural genius, and especially of the most uncommon sagacity, to the acquisition of knowledge, and with the great reputation he had justly acquired, by diffusing the treasures of his wisdom and observation. He was known for his examination before the House of Commons: he was known for the fierce and virulent obloquy that had been heaped upon him (for he, too, was visited with obloquy) by Wedderburne, afterwards Lord Loughborough, before the Privy Council; he was known as a man of letters, as a scientific philosopher, and, what is more, as a practical philosopher, too; and he was known as a statesman and as a patriot. His fame had gone before him—it shed a lustre upon his country, wherever there were men who could appreciate his merit, and that lustre is still undiminished. I do not exactly know what coat he wore. It is somewhere recorded, that, in French society, his straight combed, venerable locks, and simple dress, were admired by the ladies, who then gave the tone to society. It was something strange, out of the common way, and if it had been even uncouth, it might have attracted still more attention. How he appeared at Court,* as to dress, I do not remember to have seen particularly stated. He was a long time in France before he was received. His public reception was not till about the time of the treaty.

This livery, however, as it has been reproachfully called—I cannot say I have worn it—but I know what it is—and have heard something of his history. Our Ministers abroad are very poorly paid. They cannot bear the expense of Court dresses. If borne by the Treasury, as a contingent expense, it is so much money thrown away. If borne by Ministers, it makes an unreasonable charge upon their allowance. The salaries of our ministers abroad were higher, by above twenty-six hundred dollars, in the time of Franklin, than they are now, though the expenses of living were then probably not more than half of what they are at this time. The present rate of allowance was fixed as long ago as the year 1784, by an act of the old Congress. How, then, does the matter stand? The House will recollect, from a statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that our distinguished fellow citizen, the late President of the United States [Mr. Monroe] was engaged in four missions in the course of little more than a year. Claims growing out of that employment have lately been allowed by Congress. He was led in rapid succession to different Courts, and probably obliged at each to conform to the mode established by etiquette. The expense would be for a single occasion. There are instances of charges allowed by the Government, for the dresses of Ministers for particular occasions. When Mr. Madison was President, and Mr. Monroe Secretary of State, the present plan was adopted as a relief. It is not obligatory upon the Minister. He may dispense with it if he think fit. It is no expense to the Treasury, for the Minister must pay for it himself. But he has the sanction of his country to wear it. As long as it lasts, he need make no change. Wherever he goes, he is in the dress of his own country, and stands upon his own ground, instead of being obliged to conform to foreign fashions. It has been spoken of as costing 750 dollars. That is too high. It costs something more than half that sum; but the Minister pays for it, not the Treasury. Why call it reproachfully, livery? It is no more a livery than the coat of an officer of the Army or the Navy—it is probably not finer than the coat of a general officer. If it be a livery, is there any disgrace in wearing it? We are all servants of the People—they are our masters—the livery worn by their servants is one which no man need be ashamed to wear. It is the livery of the People of the United States. This is understood to be the history of the coat. If any one within the sound of my voice should hereafter be appointed a Minister—my advice may be of little value—but I recommend him to put on the livery of his country.

It is not questioned that it is the duty of the Executive to conform to existing laws and policy. It is admitted that, if the appointment be directed by law, there is no choice. But he understood his colleague [Mr. INGHAM] to assert the application of a rule of judgment, which he was sure, upon deliberate consideration, he [Mr. I.] would see to be unjust, infinitely mischievous, and dangerous. He was understood to say, that, even where the act is lawful, he would inquire into the intention, the quo animo. He would appeal to his colleague, if this mode of judging was not the root of incalculable mischief and injustice. A man performs his duty, walks cautiously, is, if you please, a religious man—some one chooses to inquire into the quo animo, and pronounces him a hypocrite. [Mr. INGHAM explained. He did not say that he would apply that rule. He had said that it would be applied elsewhere.]

Mr. SERGEANT said he accepted the explanation of his colleague, whom he should be sorry to misunderstand. No doubt he meant that it was not a rule which, as a member of the House, he would apply here. But he submitted to him that it was unsafe and uncharitable every where. He had the sanction of the House for saying it was unjust. The first rule we are obliged to adopt is, that no member shall be at liberty to impeach another member's intention. Upon what grounds the People of this country would decide the question now pending before them, he would not now enquire—he would not say a single word. As one of the People, he had his rights, which at proper times and on proper occasions he would freely exercise.

Some particular instances have been more or less alluded to in the debate. Among the rest was the mission to England. It was said the Minister had returned re infecta, and of course it must have been meant that there was all the expense of the mission without any correspondent benefit. What was the fact? The hand of sickness had fallen upon the Minister, as it may upon any of us—it may now be upon some of us—and incapacitated him to perform the duty. Can this be matter of charge against any body?

*It is believed, upon good authority, that he appeared in a full Court dress. The character of this eminent man would lead us to believe, that he would, in this respect, conform to the usage of the Court.—Note by Mr. S.

Retrenchment.

[Feb. 2, 1855.]

[Mr. RANDOLPH explained. He expressed his deep regret for that gentleman, [Mr. King] and declared that the words did not import any reflection upon him, nor attach any blame to him.]*

Mr. SERGEANT proceeded. They were not so understood. He was sure that the gentleman from Virginia did not mean to say one unkind or reproachful word of Mr. King. The allusion to the unproductiveness of the mission had come from another quarter, and he [Mr. S.] had adopted the phrase used by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] It was his [Mr. S's] object, to show, that no one was to blame for the issue, neither he who undertook the mission, nor those who appointed him. Of that eminent man, all know something; but few of us, probably, know the full extent and measure of his services to his country. He confessed that he had himself been ignorant till within a few days past, when he was led into an inquiry which discovered to him a length and magnitude of public service, beyond what he had before known or supposed. With regard to his age, it was sufficient to say, that he had just left the Senate when he was appointed to England, and that body afterwards approved the nomination. He was not so old as Franklin was when he left this country for France, and Franklin served his country faithfully and ably as their Minister, for eight years and a half. [Mr. RANDOLPH was here understood to say—"there could not have been a better choice."]

Of that mission, he said, which had also been alluded to, in which he had the honor to have a part, the mission to Panama, he should always have difficulty in speaking, for very obvious reasons. At this time, it was impossible he should enter into the subject, because the mission was still pending, in the hands of our Minister at Mexico. He would say, however, in reply to the allegations which had been made against it, that the mission had the clear sanction of all the branches of the Government. What has since occurred, could neither make it right or wrong: It stood upon the same footing as at first. If it was right then, it cannot be wrong now. But he would say—and he said it with the utmost sincerity, it was but the humble opinion of an individual—he would say, from all that he had seen, and all that he had heard, that, if the Congress should assemble at Tacubaya, or elsewhere, it was of the greatest importance to the interests of the United States that we should be represented in it. He was not about to debate the matter. He merely gave this as his own single, humble, perhaps valueless opinion.

He would take up, he said, but little more of the time of the House, to notice one or two other topics which had been introduced into the discussion. A great deal had been said about the patronage of the Government, and its employment to strengthen the Administration in the possession of power. This had been particularly and forcibly insisted upon by the gentleman from South Carolina. Upon this point, he said, he [Mr. S.] might probably differ from many, and perhaps be thought singular. But so far from thinking patronage a source of power, he regarded it as a destroying canker, let it be employed as it might. He was much inclined to believe, that the Executive would be stronger without it. He would not appeal in support of this opinion, to a statesman of former times—he did not like the authority; that statesman had employed a more direct mode—but he would appeal to the nature of man. Let gentlemen reflect, and then, he said, let them tell me which are the strongest passions and feelings of our nature—those which seek our own gratification, or those which terminate in doing good or in doing justice to others? Gratitude, for example, or self love, revenge, dislike. The one is moderate, and dull—the other, active, violent, and enduring. He who has the power to appoint, must also disappoint. For one that he can appoint, he must disappoint ten; and all who are disappointed are very apt to be offended, and think themselves injured. The one who is selected may feel a cool and temperate regard for the Executive. Even this is not always the case; in many instances, pride suggests to us that we owe nothing but to our own proper merits. The disappointed applicants, on the contrary, each of whom supposes himself to be at least as deserving as the successful candidate, deeply feel the wrong they think has been done them, and they yield themselves to the resentment it naturally excites. No, [said he:] give me no patronage, where there are so many to solicit, who think they have equal claims. But this is not all. The present debate proves it. There is no part of the conduct of a public man so liable to misconstruction—say, so inevitably exposed to misconstruction, especially in times of party excitement, as the exercise of this power, called patronage. He must exercise it, because the Constitution and laws require him to do so; he has no choice but to make the needful appointments; and yet, the moment he has made them, by the application of the rule of quo animo, they are imputed to unworthy motives. If he appoint a friend, it is to secure him. If he appoints an enemy, it is to buy him. Every way it is corrupt.

He cannot possibly escape censure, unless perhaps he could find some comfortable neutral, sitting quietly by his fireside, ignorant of the political storm that is raging around him, who has never heard, or, if he has heard, has forgotten, that there are two candidates for the Presidency, and who is so entirely destitute of all public feeling and knowledge, as to be on that account unfit for office. If he appoint friend or foe, it is sure to be wrong. How such patronage could be deemed a source of power, especially of undue power, endangering the fair working of the Constitution, he could not understand. The power of appointment must be deposited somewhere. If any one can show that, as now deposited, it is likely to do injury, and that it can with greater safety be placed elsewhere, he, for one, would willingly concur in the change. The condition of public men in this country—there is no danger, in saying this, of extinguishing ambition in the heart of man—was far, very far from enviable. He who enters into this career, with the purpose of devoting himself to the public service, takes a vow of perpetual poverty—a vow, too, which he will be obliged to keep. Circumstances will extort from him its observance, without any extraordinary effort of virtue on his part to keep it. Unless he has a private fortune to support him, this must be his doom. There are lamentable instances in our history to prove it. With poverty, he must be prepared to bear reproach. If he attain to an elevated station, he is immediately an object of envy, for that which, after all, is not enviable. In times of strong excitement, of party excitement particularly, he must be judged by men who, though they believe themselves just, and may be really disposed to be just, yet cannot be just, because they are under the dominion of passion. He must be judged by party opponents in the heat of angry contest. It becomes us, then, in the discharge of the functions belonging to us by the Constitution, not to indulge too readily in suspicion and misconstruction of a co-ordinate branch of the Government.

Parties exist in this House, and in the country. Of all the bad effects of high party feeling, there is none more obvious, and none more injurious, than the disposition to do injustice to each other's motives and intentions.

* Note by Mr. Randolph.—Mr. R. has observed, in the report of Mr. Sergeant's speech, that, what he said in reference to Mr. Rufus King, is stated in a way to give room for very wrong inferences, on the part of the reader; but he has not had either health, or leisure, to write down what he did say on the occasion. He purposes doing so at the first spare moment.

Retrenchment.

see how it operates here. We have every inducement to cultivate a good understanding, and to think well of each other. And yet, let what will be before the House, unless it be some matter purely local, whatever a member says, and whatever he does, is immediately referred to party views and motives. If, standing here upon a footing of equality, in habits of daily intercourse, and with every disposition to maintain relations of mutual kindness and respect, we yet cannot escape unjust judgment from each other, what chance have those who are separated from us by distance and employment, and whose places are the object of contention? This Government, as has already been said, in all its branches, was instituted by the People, and for the People, to promote their own welfare. Looking to that purpose, the People, true to themselves, will test the conduct of the Administration by its measures. Are those measures such as are calculated to promote the great object of Government, and such as the People approve? If they are, the People, applying the test by which they try the conduct of all public servants, will give them their approbation. And why should it not be so? If the Constitution and the laws have been faithfully executed, if the public welfare has been promoted—assumption may suggest other inquiries, but here, upon every sober estimate, they must, and here I believe they will end.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] assuming what yet remains to be decided, that the People had already condemned the Administration, went on to say, that, as there was a majority against them, in both Houses of Congress, they ought to retire—that there was no instance till that of the younger Pitt, of a Minister remaining in power when he was in the minority, and he had obtained a parritch triumph over the Constitution of his country. Sir, [said Mr. SERGEANT] is there any such analogy between the Constitution of Great Britain, and the Constitution of the United States, that we ought to adopt, in this respect, the doctrine of England? What is the Constitution of Great Britain? There is a hereditary Crown. The Ministry is appointed by the King, and that Ministry carries on the business of the Nation by means of a majority in Parliament as its instrument. This is the practical working of the British Constitution. The Ministry is generally secure of a majority, though for a moment Mr. Pitt was without it. In the practice under that Constitution, every measure originates with the Ministry, and the Minister is to answer for it, and he is to answer, too, for its failure. If he cannot pass his measures through Parliament, what happens then? The crown is placed aloft, to glitter in the eyes of the Nation, and is not to be disturbed. It is irresponsible. The King can do no wrong. The Minister is accountable for everything. If he cannot wield the power of Parliament, he must go out, and give place to one who can; and thus the harmony of the Constitution is—not restored—but reserved. How and by what means it happens that the Minister generally has a majority in Parliament, we all very well know. That is their Government, and as it concerns only themselves, if they are satisfied, we have no right to object. But, is that the Constitution of the United States? He would not be guilty of the absurdity of asking whether we had a hereditary Crown, or Ministers appointed by the Crown. He meant to ask, and to ask seriously, whether it was indispensable to the working of our Constitution, that the two Houses of Congress and the Executive, both deriving their authority from the same source, the People of the United States, should be in such entire accord, that, whatever the Executive may send us shall pass, and whatever he does not send us, shall not pass. He had never so understood it.

Constituted as our Government is, he said he could not see with what propriety it could be said that there was a majority of this House opposed to the President. He did not understand it, speaking the language of the Constitution of the United States. He understood it perfectly as applied to the Government of Great Britain. How can there be a majority of this House against the President? When, as is now the case, an election of Chief Magistrate is approaching, there may be a majority of the members, who are individually opposed to the re-election of the President. But would a majority of this House, on that account, oppose his administration, if right in itself? Would they, for that reason, oppose a measure which he should recommend, simply because he recommended it, though it were manifestly wise and fit in itself? That would be factious. It would be inconsistent with the sound doctrine of the Constitution. We do not come here to carry through the measures of the Executive, as the majority of the House of Commons carry through the measures of the Ministry. Neither do we come here to carry on a regular opposition. We have full power ourselves to originate plans for the public good, and we ought to adopt the recommendations and views of the Executive when they appear to us conducive to the same end.

It would, indeed, be an extraordinary anomaly, if a majority of Congress could turn out, or drive out, a President, during the period for which he is elected. So far was this from being the case, that the Government would work just as well if we could not tell who, in this House, was for, and who against, the Administration. Mr. Pitt, it has been said by the gentleman from Virginia, overthrew, or triumphed over, the Constitution, by maintaining his post against a majority of the House—that is, the Constitution as it was understood in practice before that time: for in theory, such was not the Constitution, even of England. But what followed? Mr. Pitt dissolved the Parliament, and threw himself upon the nation for support. The People approved his measures; gave him a majority in Parliament: and thenceforth, I suppose, according to theory and practice both, he was rightfully a Minister. As far as our institutions will permit, something of the same sort may happen here. Not that the People of this country will choose a Congress for or against the President: that is not the issue. There is an appeal now pending before the People: it is still pending, however the gentleman from Virginia may think it already decided: it is yet to be decided by the free voice of the People of the United States, at the next election of President. If it should be decided differently from what he thinks, and if, at the same time, it should happen—that members should be sent here who, like the present, are opposed to the Administration, still he [Mr. S.] saw nothing to prevent co-operation in promoting the public welfare. However that might be, he [Mr. R.] surely would not then contend that the President ought to retire and vacate the place to which he was constitutionally elected, because there was a majority of Congress against him. We all derive our authority from the same source; we hold by the same tenure; we are co-ordinate branches of the same Government; and not one an instrument in the hands of the other, or subjected to the will or power of the other. We have not the British Constitution.

He said he was no prophet, and would venture no prediction as to the result of that great appeal. If the People of this country should think with the gentleman from Virginia, that military capacity, whether in exercise or not, was desirable or indispensable in the head of this Government, it might have an influence upon their decision.

Mr. RANDOLPH explained.

Mr. SERGEANT proceeded: I do not wish to misunderstand or mistake the gentleman from Virginia, and I accept his explanation—that he only stated, that sagacity and courage, and the capacity for managing men, which are necessary military talents, are equally necessary in civil affairs. Thus understood, it means nothing more than that the genius, which constitutes a great military man, is a very high quality, and may be equally useful in the cabinet and in the field; that it has a sort of universality, equally applicable to all affairs. We had seen undoubtedly, one instance of a rare and wonderful combination of civil and military qualifications—both of the highest order. WASHINGTON was equally illustrious in either department. But WASHINGTON was the production of an age. He belongs to an age, and will give it character by his matchless worth. When ages shall have rolled away, he will stand still more exalted, above all those who have so much occupied our attention, with their bustling and restless ambition. He will be remembered when they are forgotten, and his memory will continue to be without blot or stain. That the greatest civil qualifications may be found united with the highest military ones, is what no one will deny, who thinks of WASHINGTON. But, that such a combination is rare and extraordinary, the fame of WASHINGTON sufficiently attests. If it were common, why was he so illustrious?

But let it be remembered, also, that WASHINGTON had experience in civil, as well as in military affairs; and his country had had experience of him in both. He was a member of the Virginia Legislature before the Revolution. He was a delegate from Virginia to the first Congress. He left his seat in Congress to take command of his country's army in the field. He was a member, and he was the chosen President of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. In civil employment, and for high civil qualifications, he was well known to his country, before he was entrusted with the high office of President of the United States, and there was a thorough assurance that he had the requisite knowledge, temper, and habit. It is not questioned, therefore, that, in WASHINGTON, civil and military qualifications were combined, both in the highest degree. But the gentleman from Virginia will not deny—no one who has read the history, or considered the nature of man, can deny—that the talent for war may exist, without the qualifications or acquirements for civil rule; that there may be evidence of the one, and no evidence of the other; nay, it appears to me to be impossible to deny, that qualities which are perfectly compatible with the character of a valiant and successful soldier, may be utterly inconsistent with the peaceful administration of a Republic. I will not, [said Mr. S.] detain the House, by entering into a historical discussion of Caesar and Cromwell, and Napoleon—familiar subjects and well understood; nor will I inquire how far their bad example is palliated by the apology which has been attempted for them, that they were the offspring of the times, and made no change for the worse. Say what you will, it cannot alter the fact. But, selecting one of them for a moment's consideration, I would ask, what did Cromwell do for England, with all his military genius? He overthrew the monarchy, and established dictatorial power in his own person. And what happened next? Another soldier overthrew the dictatorship, and restored the monarchy. The sword effected both. Cromwell made one revolution, and Monk another; and what did the People of England gain by it? Nothing, absolutely nothing. The rights and liberties of Englishmen, as they now exist, were settled and established at the revolution in 1688. Now mark the difference. By whom was that revolution begun and conducted? Was it by soldiers—by military genius—by the sword? No. It was the work of statesmen and of eminent lawyers; never distinguished for military exploits. The faculty may have existed—the dormant faculty. That is what no one can affirm, and no one can deny. But it would have been thought an absurd and extravagant thing to propose, that one of those eminent statesmen and lawyers, in reliance upon this possible dormant faculty, should be sent afterwards, instead of the Duke of Marlborough, to command the English forces on the Continent. These, then, are the fruits of civil wisdom, which England had not gained under Cromwell, nor by the aid of Monk—and there they flourish still, as they grew out of the revolution in 1688, planted by the hands of statesmen.

In this humble plea for civil qualification, let me advert to another, and greater, and, to us, much more interesting transaction. Who achieved the freedom and the independence of this, our country? Washington effected much in the field; but where were the Franklins, the Adamses, the Hancocks, the Jeffersons, and the Lees—the band of sages and patriots whose memory we revere? They were assembled in council. The heart of the Revolution was in the Hall of Congress. There was the power which, beginning with appeals to the King, and to the British nation, at length made an irresistible appeal to the world, and consummated the Revolution by the Declaration of Independence, which Washington, clothed with their authority, and bearing their commission, supported by arms. And what has this band of patriots, of sages, and of statesmen, given to us? Not what Caesar gave to Rome; not what Cromwell gave to England; or Napoleon to France: they established for us the great principles of civil, political, and religious liberty, upon the strong foundations on which they have hitherto stood, and secured for us the signal blessings we now enjoy. There may have been military capacity in Congress; but can any one deny that it is to the wisdom of sages, Washington being one, we are indebted for many of the best of our enjoyments? Look at the condition of the new States of this hemisphere. One great cause of disorder, it appears to me, which prevents them from settling down in peace, is, that they have no such band of sages to direct their course. Whenever you hear of disturbance, it is General against General, soldier against soldier—it is the military spirit, generated by their wars, and not yet sufficiently controlled by the councils of peaceful wisdom.

I will not, [said Mr. S.] be tempted to reflect upon the distinguished soldier who has been honored, ay, highly honored, by his country. Far be it from me, in this plea for civil virtues, to detract from his military renown. He has done good service. So has his great competitor. I do not pretend to say what will be the result of the election. But this I do know—time will judge us all, and award to every one according to his real merits, undisturbed by the mists of prejudice and of passion. The warrior crown will adorn the brow of the soldier—the wreath of civic merit cannot be denied to the patriot who has faithfully served his country for forty years, without reproach. I would not needlessly pluck a leaf from either.

Mr. S. said he would not have made these remarks, but for what appeared to him the bearing of the argument he had heard yesterday from the gentleman from Virginia. He had occupied more time than he had intended, and probably dwelt on some points with tedious minuteness. Here he would leave the matter, thanking the House for its attention. He acknowledged a decided opinion and disposition to one side of the great question so often alluded to; but, however strong his wishes were for its success, he did not desire unnecessarily to inflict a wound upon any one.

RETRENCHMENT.

The House having again proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, as proposed to be amended by Mr. BLAKE, and Mr. HAMILTON—

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and said, perhaps it would be vain to inquire by whom this debate was introduced. It is certain that we have now got into it, and no gentleman can predict when it will close. I cannot agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] that the Opposition are justly chargeable with its introduction in the party form which it has assumed, nor for its protracted character. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER] has truly stated, what would have been the probable course of the resolutions, had it not been for the interference of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BARNET.] The mover of them, who is a young member of the House, would have made a speech in favor of their passage, and they would then have rested quietly with the numberless resolutions which have gone before them. The gentleman from Maryland, however, opposed their passage, upon the ground that no cause existed even to suspect the present Administration of any abuses. From that moment the debate assumed a party complexion.

This debate would have ended on Thursday last, after the solemn appeal for that purpose, which was made to the House by the venerable gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] had not the gentleman from Massachusetts himself prevented it, by moving an adjournment. That gentleman ought to know, that he can never throw himself into any debate, without giving it fresh vigor and importance.

It is true that a single straggler from the ranks of the Opposition introduced these resolutions, but without the least intention of bringing on a general engagement. When he was attacked, he defended himself in gallant style, and we were obliged both by duty and by policy to sustain him. It is for that purpose I have risen. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] and my friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SEBASTYAN] have entirely changed the character of the debate, and have gone into an elaborate vindication of the present Administration. It is my purpose to reply to their arguments.

My colleague commenced his remarks, by assigning several reasons why he would not have offered the resolutions which had been submitted to the House by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON.] Against these reasons, with one exception, I have no complaint to make. My colleague has declared, that he would not have introduced such resolutions, because they might tend to injure the Government of the country, in the estimation of the People. Against this position I take leave to enter my solemn protest. Is it the Republican doctrine? What, sir, are we to be told that we shall not inquire into the existence of abuses in this Government, because such an inquiry might tend to make the Government less popular? This is new doctrine to me—doctrine which I have never heard before upon this floor.

Liberty, sir, is a precious gift, which can never long be enjoyed by any People, without the most watchful jealousy. It is Hesperian fruit, which the ever-wakeful jealousy of the People can alone preserve. The very possession of power has a strong—a natural tendency, to corrupt the heart. The lust of dominion grows with its possession; and the man who, in humble life, was pure, and innocent, and just, has often been transformed, by the long possession of power, into a monster. In the Sacred Book, which contains lessons of wisdom for the politician, as well as for the Christian, we find a happy illustration of the corrupting influence of power upon the human heart. When Hazael came to consult Elisha, whether his master, the King of Syria, would recover from a dangerous illness, the prophet, looking through the vista of futurity, saw the crimes of which the messenger who stood before him would be guilty, and he wept. Hazael asked, why weepeth my Lord? The prophet then recounted to him, the murders and the cruelties of which he should be guilty, towards the children of Israel. Hazael, in the spirit of virtuous indignation, replied—Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing? "And Elisha answered, the Lord hath shewed me, that thou shalt be king over Syria." This man afterwards became king, by the murder of his master, and was guilty of enormities, the bare recital of which would make us shudder.

The nature of man is the same under Republics and under Monarchies. The history of the human race proves, that liberty can never long be preserved, without popular jealousy. It is the condition of its enjoyment. Our rulers must be narrowly watched. When my colleague advanced the position which he did, he could not have foreseen the consequences to which his doctrine would lead. I know that he never could have intended that it should reach thus far; but yet my inference is perfectly fair, when I declare that it is a doctrine which only suits the calm of despotism. It is the maxim of despots, that the People should never inquire into the concerns of Government. Those who have enslaved mankind, from Caesar to Bonaparte, have always endeavored, by presenting them with amusements, and by every other means in their power, to attract the attention of the People from the conduct of their rulers. I therefore differ, tofo celo, from my colleague, upon this point. If the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON] shall have the effect of more earnestly and more closely directing the attention of the People to the concerns of the Government, the result will be most fortunate. If the Government has been administered upon correct principles, an intelligent People will do justice to their rulers; if not, they will take care that every abuse shall be corrected.

My colleague used an argument, for the purpose of sustaining the present Administration, which I should not have expected from that quarter. He has stated, that, since the year 1816, the national debt had been reduced, from 126 to 66 millions of dollars. This is very true; and from the argument of the gentleman, one who was ignorant of the subject might be induced to believe, that a large portion of this reduction may be fairly attributed to the present Administration. He evidently endeavored to make this impression upon the House.

I would ask the gentleman what agency had the present Administration—nay, what agency could they possibly have had, in the reduction of the public debt? Are they entitled to the least credit upon that account? Certainly not. It was a subject over which they had no control. The laws which brought the revenue into the Treasury, out of which the debt was paid, existed long before they came into existence. Commerce waited into our ports wealth from all nations, and the duties which were collected on the importation of foreign merchandise, they were bound to apply to the extinguishment of the demands which existed against the country. The Administration only did that, which they could not have avoided doing. The money flowed into the Treasury without their agency, and they applied that portion of it which they were bound by law to apply, to the extinguishment of the public debt. I have hitherto admitted, that they applied it fairly. The ancient British monarch, who, to show his People the impotence of human power, commanded the tides of the ocean not to flow, had no more authority over the laws of nature, than the present Administration could have had, in preventing the tide of wealth, out of which the public debt has been reduced, from flowing into the country. Men can never be entitled to credit for doing that which they could not have avoided. The praise, therefore, which the gentleman wishes to bestow upon the present Administration, for paying the national debt, is certainly not their due.

It is true that, in times like the present, the Republic is always most in danger. When the clouds of adversity are lowering over the country, and when direct taxation becomes necessary for the support of the Government, the People are watchful and jealous, and will then attend strictly to their own concerns. It is in the halcyon days of peace and prosperity, when the jealousy of the People slumbers, that abuses are most likely to steal into the administration of your Government. I charge not the present Administration with corruption; but I do most solemnly believe, that several of their measures have had a strong tendency towards it. I thank Heaven that, in these days, a "Military Chieftain" has arisen, whose name is familiar to the lips of even the most humble citizen of this country, because his services live in their hearts, who will be able, by the suffrages of the People, to wrest the power of this Government from the hands of its present possessors. No one else could, at this time, have successfully opposed the immense patronage and power of the Administration.

I think I have shown, that the present Administration have not the least claim to merit, for the payment of the public debt. It is a claim which has no foundation upon which to rest. It is one of the splendid generalities to which my colleague has resorted, which, when you come to examine minutely, vanishes from the touch.

I shall now leave my colleague from Pennsylvania, but with the intention of returning to him, after I shall have disposed of some of the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] Before, however I commence my reply to that gentleman, I beg leave to make a few observations upon the last Presidential election. I shall purposely pass over every charge which has been made, that it was accomplished by bargain and sale, or by actual corruption. If that were the case, I have no knowledge of the fact; and shall therefore say nothing about it. I shall argue this question as though no such charges had ever been made. So far as it regards the conduct which the people of the United States ought to pursue, at the approaching election, I agree entirely with the eloquent gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] (I cannot with propriety call him my friend,) that it can make no difference whether a bargain existed or not. Nay, in some aspects in which the subject may be viewed, the danger to the People would be the greater, if no corruption had existed. 'It is true, that this circumstance ought greatly to influence our individual opinions of the men who now wield the destinies of the Republic; but yet the precedent would be at least equally dangerous, in the one case, as in the other. If flagrant and gross corruption had existed, every honest man would start from it with instinctive horror, and the People would indignantly hurl those men from the seats of power, who had thus betrayed their dearest interests. If the election were pure, there is, therefore, the greater danger in the precedent. I believe, in my soul, that the precedent which was established at the last Presidential election, ought to be reversed by the People, and this is one of my principal reasons for opposing the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate.

Let us examine this subject more closely. General Jackson was returned by the People of this country to the House of Representatives, with a plurality of electoral votes. The distinguished individual who is now the Secretary of State, was then the Speaker of this House. It is perfectly well known, that, without his vote and influence, Mr. Adams could not have been elected President. After the election, we beheld that distinguished individual, and no man in the United States witnessed the spectacle with more regret than I did, descending—yes, sir, I say descending—from the elevated station which you now occupy, into the cabinet of the President whom he had elected.

In the midnight of danger, during the darkest period of the late war, "his thrilling trumpet had cheered the land." Although among the great men of that day there was no acknowledged leader upon this floor, yet I have been informed, upon the best authority, that he was "primus inter pares." I did wish, at a future time, to see him elevated still higher. I am one of the last men in the country who could triumph over his fallen fortunes. Should he ever return to what I believe to be correct political principles, I shall willingly fight in the same ranks with him as a companion—nay, after a short probation, I should willingly acknowledge him as a leader. What brilliant prospects has that man not sacrificed!

This precedent, should it be confirmed by the People at the next election, will be one of most dangerous character to the Republic. The election of President must, I fear, often devolve upon this House. We have but little reason to expect, that any amendment, in relation to this subject, will be made to the Constitution in our day. There are so many conflicting interests to reconcile, so many powers to balance, that, when we consider the large majority in each branch of Congress, and the still larger majority of States, required to amend the Constitution, the prospect of any change is almost hopeless. I believe it will long remain just as it is. What an example, then, will this precedent, in the pure age of the Republic, present to future times! The People owe it to themselves, if the election must devolve upon this House, never to sanction the principle that one of its members may accept, from the person whom he has elected, any high office, much less the highest in his gift. Such a principle, if once established, must, in the end, destroy the purity of this House, and convert it into a corrupt electoral conclave. If the individual to whom I have alluded, could elect a President, and receive from him the office of Secretary of State, from the purest motives, other men may, and hereafter will, pursue the same policy, from the most corrupt. "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" This precedent will become a cover, under which future bargains and corrupt combinations will be sanctioned; under which the spirit of the Constitution will be sacrificed to its letter.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, enter upon a more particular reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] I wish I were able to follow the example of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] and to take the general and comprehensive views of political subjects, which he recommended. As I cannot pursue that course, I must enter into detail, and make such a speech as he would attribute to a lawyer.

What was the first important act of the present Administration? No, not the first, but the first after that message which certainly partook much more of the spirit of the "Statesman of 40 years," who had been bred in foreign courts, than that of the plain simple American Republican. The President claimed the power, and mere courtesy prevented him from exercising it, of commissioning ministers to attend the Congress of Panama, without "the advice and consent of the Senate." My friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON] was, in my opinion, correct, when he declared, that one of the first important acts of the President had been, to claim a power in direct violation of the Constitution. That instrument declares, that the President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." This is a clear, plain provision. Upon what authority, then, did the President claim the right to send Ministers to this Congress, without the consent of the Senate? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] has answered the question, and has sustained this claim of power, by a most novel argument. He has read to us the act of Congress, of July 1, 1790, which provides, "that the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to draw from the Treasury of the United States, a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, annually, to be paid out of the moneys arising from the duties on imports and tonnage for the support of such persons as he shall commission to serve the United States in foreign parts, and for the expense incident to the business in which they may be employed." How commission? Without the advice and consent of the Senate? Certainly not; unless you can suppose that the very first Congress under the Constitution, deliberately intended to destroy the power which the Constitution had wisely conferred upon the Senate. The language of the act of Congress is perfectly consistent with the power of the Senate; because the President does, in fact, always commission public Ministers and other officers of the Government, after the Senate have advised and consented to their appointment. This phraseology was continued, in the several acts providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, until the year 1800, when the act of the 19th of March, 1798, the last in which it had been used, was suffered to expire. Since that time, no such expression has ever been introduced into any of the subsequent acts. And yet this phrase, which had been employed in acts that have long ceased to exist, was laid hold of by the President to justify this extraordinary claim of power. Whilst it affords no ground for his justification, it shows how desirous men in power are to lay hold of every pretext, no matter how trifling, to extend their authority. This is a law of nature, which can never be abolished by any law of man. It proves, conclusively, the wisdom and the necessity of watching over our rulers, with a jealous eye.

I shall now proceed to assail another position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] He argued against including in the resolutions before the House the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The gentleman shakes his head. He certainly did say, that it looked like trenching upon the prerogatives of the Executive. The gentleman believes that the expenditure of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, is a prominent point before the House. I think so too.

The application of this entire fund is left to the sound discretion of the Executive, and is to be accounted for at the Treasury, in a two-fold manner. It is his duty to account specially, and produce regular vouchers, "in all instances, wherein the expenditure thereof may, in his judgment, be made public." When that is not the case, he settles the account, "by making a certificate of the amount of such expenditures as he may think it advisable not to specify." This last is called the secret service money. This is the distinction between the two portions of the fund. It is necessary for the good of the People, that the manner in which the secret service money is expended, should not be made public. If the names of those persons to whom it is given were not kept secret, the Government, in times of peril, might be prevented from getting important information, which they could otherwise obtain. But, Mr. Speaker, give me the Administration which requires but little secret service money, especially in time of peace. Indeed, I am inclined to believe, that none is then necessary. A Republican Government ought to be open in its conduct, and have as few secrets as possible. Upon one occasion, Jefferson returned the entire contingent fund, which had been appropriated for foreign intercourse, untouched. I am just informed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] that Washington did the same. These are examples well worthy of imitation in our day.

I do not wish to know the manner in which the present Administration have applied the secret service money. I shall never knowingly invade a single right which belongs to the Executive. These resolutions contain no such principle; but one great reason, why they have found any favor in my eyes, is, that I wish to ascertain the aggregate amount, not the items, of the secret service money which has been expended since the present Administration came into power, and I wish to have a special account laid before this House, of the manner in which the residue of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse has been expended. This will be an invasion of no prerogative which belongs to the President.

I now approach the main argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] and in the commencement, I shall lay down a position broadly, which I believe I shall be able to prove conclusively—that the President of the United States did receive an outfit of $9000, whilst he was a Minister abroad, in direct and palpable violation of a law of the United States; and that at this day he retains in his pocket one half of that sum, in opposition to the declared opinion of the Congress of the United States. If I shall not establish this proposition, I have never been more mistaken in my life.

In relation to outfits to be granted to public Ministers, all the acts of Congress which preceded that of the 1st May, 1810, spoke the same language. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] gave us an historical sketch of these laws; but, as they are all the same in regard to the question I am now about to argue, I shall only refer to the act of the 10th May, 1800. It was that act, which ascertained the compensation of public Ministers, from its date, until it was repealed by the act of 1st May, 1810. I shall read its first section.

"Be it enacted, &c. That exclusive of an outfit, which shall, in no case, exceed the amount of one year's salary to any Minister Plenipotentiary, or Chargé des Affaires, to whom the same may be allowed, the President of the United States shall not allow to any Minister Plenipotentiary a greater sum than at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum, as a compensation for all his services and expenses; nor a greater sum for the same, than four thousand five hundred dollars per annum to a Chargé des Affaires; nor a greater sum for the same than one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars per annum to the Secretary of any Minister Plenipotentiary."

From the origin of the government, until the year 1810, the President clearly had the right to allow an outfit to a Minister, whom he might think proper to transfer from one European Court to another. The language of the act of 1800, and of the previous acts, is general and indefinite. Whether they would have justified him in making such an allowance, to a Minister whom he might have employed upon a new mission, the functions of which were to be exercised at the Court where he resided, is a question upon which I shall express no opinion.

The act of 1810 limited the general language of that of 1800, and confined the discretion of the President, in the allowance of outfits, to the case of a Minister "on going from the United States to any foreign country." The first section of that act, after fixing the annual compensation of foreign Ministers, Chargés, and Secretaries of Legation, contains the following enactment: "Provided, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to allow to a Minister Plenipotentiary, or Chargé des Affaires, on going from the United States to any foreign country, an outfit, which shall in no case exceed one year's full salary of such Minister or Chargé des Affaires." This act, in express terms, limits the general expressions of former laws. It authorizes the President to allow an outfit to every public Minister, upon his first appointment, for the purpose of establishing him abroad. After he has received one outfit, and has gone from the United States to the Government to which he has been sent, in case he should be transferred from it to another Government, the President, since the act of 1810, has not had the power of allowing him a second outfit.

I am glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] cited the cases which he has done, of the allowance of outfits to Ministers, by the Executive, upon transferring them from one European court to another. If the gentleman had not done so, we might have been at a loss to account for the change of phraseology in the act of 1810, and the difference between it, and all former acts upon the same subject. The case of the outfit to Mr. Monroe, upon his transfer from England to France, and all the other cases brought into the view of the House by the gentleman, were determined, under former laws which clearly gave to the President power over the question. These cases are authorities against the gentleman; because they conclusively show the reason which guided the Legislature, in 1810, in changing the law, and in limiting the power of the President, in the allowance of outfits to the case of Ministers, on their departure from the United States to a foreign country.

I may be asked, did Congress mean to declare, that no outfit should ever be allowed upon the transfer of a Minister from one Court to another? I answer, by no means. They intended to reserve to themselves the power of deciding, in each particular case, whether any new outfit ought to be allowed, and, if so, what should be its amount. If a Minister should be transferred from one extremity of Europe to another—from Lisbon to St. Petersburg, a new outfit of $9000 might be necessary. But, in the case of a transfer from Lisbon to Madrid, there might be no occasion for any new outfit; and, if there were, the one half of a full outfit, or even less, would probably be sufficient. The present Administration, in the estimates which they submitted to this House, at the last session of Congress, asked a second outfit of $9000 for our Minister at Mexico, because they intended to transfer him from the City of Mexico to Tacubaya, a distance of only eight or nine miles. Although I did not think it proper to allow a full outfit, in such a case, yet I was glad that the request had been made; because it showed, that the Executive were returning to a correct construction of the law, in relation to this subject. It showed that the President was unwilling to follow the precedents which existed heretofore, upon the transfer of a Minister from one court to another; or otherwise he would have allowed him an outfit, without consulting Congress.

In my judgment, the act of 1810 is so plain, that he who runs may read. It is a universal rule of construction, that when a law delegates a special power to an individual, and confines its exercise to a particular case, that it necessarily excludes him from the exercise of general power, over all other cases. The act of Congress gave to the President the special power of allowing an outfit to a Minister, when he was leaving the United States and going to a foreign country; but yet, that act has received such a construction, that the Executive have claimed and exercised the power of allowing outfits, in all cases, without limitation, and without restraint. For this purpose, the contingent fund is used, in violation of the law.

It will not only be curious, but instructive, to mark the gradual progress of the Executive, until at length they repealed the act of 1810. In the month of April, 1813, the present President, then being our resident Minister at Russia, was appointed one of the Envoys Extraordinary, under the joint commission, to treat with England. As this commission owed its origin to the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, the seat of the negotiation was to be at St. Petersburg. A short time after the appointment, Mr. Monroe then Secretary of State, transmitted to Mr. Adams, $9000, a full outfit; although, at the time, it was not contemplated that Mr. Adams should change his residence. The House will, therefore observe, that this was not even the case of a transfer from one court to another; but it was the allowance of a full second outfit to the same Minister, while he continued at the same court. The then President, when he directed the money to be sent, no doubt expected that Congress would sanction his conduct. Accordingly, we find that an appropriation was asked to cover this outfit. The question was then brought before the Congress of the United States, for their determination, and was deliberately decided. A legislative construction was given in August, 1816, to the act of 1810, against this outfit; but Congress, exercising a liberal discretion, allowed Mr. Adams $4,500 instead of $9,000.

Sometime after this determination of the question, (too long, perhaps,) on the 23d June, 1814, Mr. Monroe wrote to Mr. Adams, in the following words: "It is necessary to apprise you, that, although a full outfit was transmitted to you by the Neptune, and intended to be allowed you by the Executive, as a member of the extra mission at St. Petersburg, yet the Legislature, on a reference of the subject to them, for an appropriation, decided the principle by the amount appropriated, and the discussion which took place at the time, that half an outfit only could be allowed to a Minister, under circumstances applicable to your case. In your drafts on the bankers, and in your future accounts, you will be pleased to keep this deduction in view." After the present President had thus discovered, that the money was sent to him by mistake, did he submit to the decision of Congress? No, sir. Although, within the period of eight years, before his return to this country, he had received $115,000 from this "penurious Government;" yet he still continued to persist in retaining the whole outfit in his pocket. Congress gave a construction to their own law. They believed it had been violated, when an outfit of $9,000 was sent by the President to Mr. Adams; yet they liberally allowed him $4,500. Instead of accepting that sum with gratitude, he made a complaint against this "penurious Government," and denied the right of the Legislature of the Union to interfere. He declared "that the principle which Congress would settle, by an ultimate refusal to allow the appropriation, could be no other than a principle to confiscate, without any alleged offence."

The next year, however, conveyed him good tidings from this country. On the 19th November, 1815, Mr. Monroe wrote a letter to Mr. Adams, marked "private," from which the following is an extract. "It was doubted whether the inhibition of a greater sum than one year's salary as an outfit, contained in the terms on going from the United States, might not be construed, as precluding an allowance by way of outfit, to any Minister who did not go from the United States. Mr. Erving's appointment to Spain involved the same question. It was wished to reserve the point for more deliberate consideration, than could be bestowed on it, when the letter of March 15th was written to you. I have now the satisfaction to inform you, that the subject has been maturely weighed, and that the result has been in favor of the outfit, on the principle that those restrictive terms, if applicable to Ministers already in Europe, are no further so, than to confine the allowance to them, within the same limit." This letter communicated to him that construction of the Executive Department, which, since it was made, has entirely repealed in practice the limitation upon the allowance of outfits, contained in the act of 1810, and secured to him his full outfit, in opposition to the will of the Legislature, which had been clearly expressed in 1813. From 1810 till November, 1815, this act was obeyed both in its letter and in its spirit. Then, and not till then, did it sink under Executive construction.

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

The accounts of Mr. Adams continued unsettled at the Treasury, a balance appearing against him, until after the passage of the general appropriation bill, in April, 1822. That act provided "that no money appropriated by the said act, shall be paid to any person for his compensation, who is in arrears to the United States, until such person shall have accounted for, and paid into the Treasury, all sums for which he may be liable." In consequence of the existence of this salutary provision, the Comptroller of the Treasury refused to pay Mr. Adams his salary as Secretary of State, until his account, as a Foreign Minister, should be liquidated. He appealed from this decision to Mr. Monroe, the then President, and, in support of his appeal, cited the private letter which Mr. Monroe, when Secretary of State, had written to him in November, 1815, as conclusive of the question. In this appeal, he says, "that the President was authorized, by the first section of the act of Congress, of 1st May, 1810, to make this allowance, cannot be questioned, under the construction which has uniformly been given to it, a construction applied upon full deliberation and advisement, and which has been admitted in other cases upon the settlement of accounts at the Treasury. For this construction, I refer to the copy of your letter of the 19th November, 1815, herewith submitted."

This subject was referred, by the President, to the Attorney General of the United States, and the construction which had been placed upon the act of Congress, by the Administration, in 1815, was fully sustained, in the broadest terms, by that officer. In his opinion, dated June 5th, 1822, he declares, that the question of outfit is given to the President exclusively, and without limit, save only he is not to exceed a whole year's salary." And thus, sir, you perceive in what manner a law, which, in express terms, limited the exercise of the discretion of the President, in the allowance of outfits, to Ministers "on going from the United States to a foreign country," has become unlimited; and how the exclusive power over the question of outfit has been conferred upon the President. Notwithstanding this high authority, however, I think I have maintained my proposition, and established, conclusively, that Mr. Adams now retains in his pocket $4,500, in violation of the act of 1810 and in violation of the solemn legislative construction which it received, in 1813.

But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] even if there were any thing wrong in the settlement of the accounts of Mr. Adams, he is not to blame. He did not interfere—he left all these matters to the accounting officers of the Treasury. Is this the fact? Did he not receive the money, and does he not still retain it? Did he not refuse to refund it, when it was demanded by the Comptroller? Did he not appeal from the decision of that officer, to the President of the United States? And was not his refusal to comply with the decision of Congress, the cause why the act of 1810 has received that construction, which has given to the President "exclusively, and without limit," the power over outfits?

There is one matter of fact, which I wish to put right, before I proceed further. Mr. Adams, in his account, on the 30th June, 1814, charged the sum of $886 86, the expenses of a journey from St. Petersburg to Ghent. It is but just to him to say, that he had left his family behind him, at St. Petersburg. He never did return from Ghent to St. Petersburg; but, yet, there was allowed to him the sum of $886 86, for his expenses in returning to that capital. This is what has been so often called his constructive journey. The construction, however, did not end here. After this allowance had been made, it was discovered that the travelling expenses of Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin, from St. Petersburg to London, and from thence to Ghent, amounted, for each, to the sum of $1,556 54. Their journey was accomplished chiefly by land. In the final settlement of the account of Mr. Adams, instead of $886 86, which had been at first allowed to him for the expense of a journey which he never made, he was allowed the sum of $1,556 54. The reason for this change, which is spread upon the face of the account itself, is, that he was at first allowed but $886 86, "under an impression that the same sum, charged by him for the journey from St. Petersburg to Ghent, would be equal to the expenses of his return, but which now appears, would not have been the case, as that journey was made chiefly by water, but his return must have been by land, and by the same route as that taken by Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard, and equally expensive."

These are the facts. I shall not argue this point, but will leave it to my colleague and friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGRAM] and the gentleman from Rhode Island. I do not say that some allowance ought not to have been made to Mr. Adams, under the peculiar circumstances of the case. One thing, however, is certain; that he did receive $1,556 54, for the expenses of a journey which he never made; because he never did return from Ghent to St. Petersburg.

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH asked Mr. BUCHANAN to define what was a constructive journey.]

Mr. B. said, I cannot comply with the request of the gentleman from Virginia. If he cannot define it himself, no man in this House can.

But, it has been urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] that precedents sanction the allowance of the outfit to Mr. Adams. I admit there have been precedents in abundance since 1815; but it is against this very doctrine of "safe precedents," that I am now contending. On the fourth of March next, it will be seven and twenty years since the inauguration of Mr. Jefferson. What has been our history ever since? Each President has nominated his successor, as regularly as though the Constitution conferred upon him that power. During this period, each President has been called upon to sanction that which he had done as Secretary of State. The line of "safe precedents" has been unbroken, and the first office in the world has passed as regularly to each succeeding Secretary of State, as the imperial crown ever descended from father to son. How is it possible that abuses can ever be corrected, under such circumstances? A trifling departure from the law to-day, becomes a precedent for a greater violation to-morrow; and whilst power continues to flow in one unbroken line, abuses must still continue increasing. There is no remedy for the People, but by breaking this line of safe precedents. It is this regular course of succession, which, in the lapse of time, destroys monarchies. The abuses which the father introduces, are sanctioned and extended by the son, until at length, after a few generations, the whole Government becomes tainted with corruption, and there is nothing left for the People, but the dreadful remedy of a revolution. It is the principle against which I am now contending, without a special reference to any particular Administration. The People of the United States have at length determined to break this line of Cabinet succession, and to reverse the doctrine of safe precedents; and I trust and believe they will accomplish their purpose. Rotation in office—that salutary principle, in a Republican Government, which purifies the political atmosphere, and causes the successor to view, with a jealous and scrutinizing eye, the acts of those who have gone before him—has had no real existence, in the Federal Government, since the days of Thomas Jefferson. There has been a regular succession ever since. Is an abuse now pointed out? We are at once told, it is sanctioned by a precedent; the Monroes and the Gallatins have done the same thing, and why shall we not do so too? I answer, when the law forbids it, precedents ought to be disregarded. All the precedents which have existed since 1815, although they have violated, can never repeal the act of 1810.

I now come to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVANS] which relates to the billiard table. I should not have said one word upon this subject, did it not differ entirely, in relation to it, from the gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. HAMILTON.] I admit that the expenditure of fifty dollars is a very little matter, and this has ever been the opinion of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON] who has been so often introduced into the debate. If there be any gentleman in the House, who regards fifty dollars less than he does, I do not know the man. The question worthy of our consideration, is, not whether the price of the billiard table was paid out of the Public Treasury, or out of the private purse of the President; but whether a billiard table ought to be set up, as an article of furniture, in the House of the President of the United States? I am free to say, I think it ought not. In the State of Virginia, billiard tables are prohibited even in the mansions of private gentlemen, under very severe penalties. The gentleman from Virginia, therefore, cannot now indulge in this game at home: for I know him too well to believe that he would violate the laws of his own State. This shows the moral sense of the People of that ancient and respectable Commonwealth, in relation to the game of billiards. To use a familiar expression of their own, they do not go against either the exercise or the amusement of the play; but they know the temptation which it presents to gambling, and the consequent ruin which must follow in its train. It has a direct tendency to corrupt the morals of our youth. Indeed, I doubt whether there be a single State in the Union which has not prohibited the game of billiards. The People of the United States are generally a moral and religious People; a proper regard, therefore, for public opinion, for the scruples of the pious, ought to have prevented the first Magistrate of the Union from setting such an example. [Here Mr. RANDOLPH observed, there was no law in the District of Columbia, against playing billiards.] Mr. BUCHANAN then said, the President of the United States is not only the President of the District of Columbia, but of the whole American People; and they condemn this and every other species of gambling. Ought, then, the man who has been elevated to the most exalted station upon earth, and whose example must have a most powerful and extensive influence upon the morals of the youth of our country, to set up a billiard table, as an article of furniture, in the House which belongs to the American People? He certainly ought not to keep such an article of furniture in that house, nor ought he there to play at the game. I should never have invaded his domestic retirement, for the purpose of discovering whether he kept a billiard table or not. I should never have been the first to bring this matter, either before the House, or the country. It has been brought here by others, and I felt it to be my duty to express my opinion upon the subject.

It has been said that Washington played at billiards. Be it so. I will, however, venture the assertion, that he never set up a billiard table in the house which he occupied, at the Seat of Government, whilst he was President of the United States.

Descending from the man who occupies the most exalted station in the country, nay, in the world, to the Judges of your Courts of Justice, I would ask, whether public opinion, in any portion of this Union, would tolerate, that such a magistrate might establish a billiard table in his house, or even play publicly at the game?

Upon this subject, although I differ from the gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, yet I feel certain I do not differ from the People of the United States. They believe that the President ought never to have set such an example. Although I do not pretend to be a rigid moralist myself, yet these are my opinions.

I will now make a few remarks upon another subject, and then I shall have done with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVANS.] I do most sincerely, and from the bottom of my heart, regret, that the gentleman should have introduced the libel, which he says has been extensively circulated throughout the State of New Hampshire, into this debate. I never heard it before. I believe that the person to whom he has alluded is not only a lady by courtesy, but a lady by nature and education. I shall not credit one word derogatory to her reputation. I believe she would shrink from the idea of having her name introduced upon this floor, and thus sent over the United States in connexion with such a libel. I doubt, therefore, whether the gentleman has rendered her an acceptable service, in defending her before this House. I fear that he has exposed her to unjust and ungenerous attacks; although every feeling of honor, and every dictate of policy, will be roused for her protection. The man who attempts to destroy the character of a woman, destroys his own. The American People are chivalrous and generous in their feelings. If I were asked to say, what single circumstance has done Mr. Adams the most injury in Pennsylvania, I should answer, without hesitation, the unmanly, the ungenerous, and the unjust attacks which have been made—not by him, for I believe him to be wholly incapable of such conduct—but by the presses devoted to the Administration, against the pious, the benevolent, and the amiable lady of General Jackson. I hope none of the presses in the Opposition will follow this infamous example.

The lady to whom the gentleman has alluded stands high in the public estimation, and in mine. I trust that her name may never be connected with the politics of the day; but that, freed from any public observation which might wound her feelings, she may be left to enjoy the consciousness of having done her duty in every station of life in which she has been placed.

I shall now return to my colleague from Pennsylvania, and after noticing a few of his arguments, I shall no longer continue to exhaust the patience of the House. He has introduced into this debate, the late mission of Mr. King to England; and has attempted to defend the Administration from any blame on account of its failure. I never have, and never shall, utter a single word against the memory of that distinguished man. I know his worth too well; I am proud to say that I believe I was honored with his friendship. The failure of the mission is fairly to be attributed to the neglect of the Administration, and not either to the illness or neglect of the Minister. It is not because he was sick, but because he never received any instructions from his Government, that we have lost our trade with the British West Indies. The negotiation between this country and England in relation to the West India trade, was nearly completed by Mr. Rush, in July, 1824. There was then but a single point of difference between the two Governments. This Government claimed the right to have its productions admitted into the British West Indies upon the same terms with those of the British colony of Canada. The British Government replied, that they never could yield to such a demand; and that, upon the same principle, they might claim to have the sugar of the West Indies admitted into the ports of the United States upon the same terms with that from Louisiana. When Mr. King left this country, if he had been instructed to yield this pretension, as Mr. Gallatin was afterwards instructed to do, the treaty would have been closed, and we should, at this time, have been in the enjoyment of the trade. Is it not clear, then, that the neglect of the Administration has occasioned the failure of the negotiation? Mr. King was sent from this country early in the Summer of 1825, and did not leave London until about the 1st of July, 1826. During the whole of that period, he never received a line of instructions in relation to the principal object of his mission. Although this trade was by far the most important point in dispute between the two Governments, it was as entirely abandoned as though a question about it had never existed. All that the Administration had to say to Mr. King, was, go to England, abandon our former claim, and close the treaty; and we have every reason to believe the treaty would have been closed. When Mr. Gallatin afterwards went to England, he received such instructions, but it was then too late. Although I should trust but little to the friendship of the British Government towards this country, yet I must believe, from the testimony before me, that, if Mr. King had received the same instructions which Mr. Gallatin afterwards did, we should not have lost the trade.

But it is said by the President of the United States, in his last message, that, in losing this trade, we have actually lost nothing. What have we lost? It is true that our productions still find their way to the British West Indies, through the neutral islands and through Canada; but the farmers of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, are compelled to pay the additional expense of the circuitous trade, both in the reduced price of the articles which we send to those markets and in the enhanced value of those which we receive in return.

There is also now a most unequal distribution of these losses among different portions of the Union. The direct trade with Canada is not prohibited; and thus we are playing into the hands of the British Government. It has been their policy to hold out every encouragement to this trade, so that they may have the carriage of our productions to their West Indies. Our flour, therefore, flows freely and directly through the St. Lawrence to the British West Indies; and thus, whilst the farmers in that portion of the Union enjoy all the benefits of a direct trade, those in every other portion are compelled to bear the burden of a trade that is circuitous.

But I am not yet done with this mission to England. Mr. John A. King went out with his father to London, as Secretary of Legation. In this character he was entitled to receive, under the act of 1810, at the rate of $2,000 per annum for his services. The illness of Mr. King prevented him from remaining in London until the arrival of Mr. Gallatin, who had been appointed his successor. He was, therefore, under the necessity of leaving his son behind him in charge of the legation, where he remained during the months of July and August, 1826, and then, upon the arrival of Mr. Gallatin, he followed his father to this country. Upon his return home, the President of the United States allowed him $4,500, the full outfit of a Chargé des Affaires.

Who is a Chargé des Affaires under the laws of this country? In every particular, so far as regards his powers, he is placed upon the same footing with our foreign Ministers. His rank is lower, and he receives but the one-half of the outfit, and one-half of the salary. Officers of this grade, from motives of economy, have usually been sent from this country to inferior courts. The act of 1810 expressly provides, that, to entitle any Chargé des Affaires either to an outfit or salary, he must be appointed such by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, if in session; if not, he may be appointed by the President alone, who is, in that case, obliged to submit the appointment to the Senate, at its next session, for their advice and consent. This act also contains a negative provision on the subject, and declares that "no compensation shall be allowed to any Chargé des Affaires who shall not be appointed as aforesaid." A mere Secretary of Legation, such as John A. King was, who, from accidental circumstances, had been left in charge of our affairs during an interval of a few weeks between the departure of one Minister, and the arrival of another, is certainly not such a Chargé des Affaires as the act of Congress recognizes.

Outfits were intended to enable our public Ministers and Chargés to create establishments at foreign courts, where the law intended they should reside; but John A. King received his outfit upon his return home. Although he never was appointed a Chargé by the President, either with or without the consent of the Senate, yet he received a salary as such, for sixty days service, and an outfit, amounting together to the sum of $5,200. This outfit was given to him, not "on going from the United States," for the purpose of establishing himself in England, but upon his return from England to this country. Thus, at length, by the existence of "safe precedents," the Administration have been brought so far to violate the law, that they have allowed an outfit for returning home, instead of going abroad. [Here Mr. RANDOLPH observed that this was an infit.] It is but just that I should admit that the Administration are not without precedents to sanction their construction of the law, although I do not believe that any one exists which goes the length of the case I have brought before the House. The existence of such precedents shows, in a more striking point of view, the necessity of returning to an economical and strict administration of the Government.

I have one word to say concerning the mission of Mr. Gallatin. If, under the existing laws, our Ministers do not receive a sufficient compensation to support them abroad (and upon this point I should be disposed to rely much upon the opinion of my colleague) let their salaries be increased. I have heard, and I have given credit to the report, that Mr. Gallatin refused to go to England, unless upon the condition that he might return after one year's absence. If such a practice should prevail, our Ministers, in violation of the spirit of the existing law, will receive, by adding the outfit to the salary, $18,000, instead of $9,000, for one year's service. This is far from being the greatest evil which will flow from such a practice. You send a Minister abroad, but for one year; and as soon as he has established himself in the confidence of the Government to which he is sent, he is permitted to return home. In this manner, the public service may be seriously injured. I am against the practice.

I now advance to attack a position in the argument of my colleague, which I believe to be a perfect paradox. He asserted, and attempted to prove, that the patronage of the Government did not tend to strengthen but rather to weaken the Administration by which it was distributed. If that gentleman's character for candor were not above suspicion, as I firmly believe it to be, I should doubt his sincerity. To establish this position, he said that gratitude was a weaker passion than self love, which I admit; and that, therefore, the Administration lost more by disappointing candidates, than they gained by their appointment. But does not the gentleman know, that, when a man is once appointed to office, all the selfish passions of his nature are enlisted, for the purpose of retaining it? The office-holders are the enlisted soldiers of that Administration by which they are sustained. Their comfortable existence often depends upon the re-election of their patron. Nor does disappointment long rankle in the hearts of the disappointed. Hope is still left to them; and bearing disappointment with patience, they know will present a new claim to office, at a future time.

In my humble judgment, the present Administration could not have proceeded a single year, with the least hope of re-election, but for their patronage. This patronage may have been used unwisely, as my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER] has insinuated. I have never blamed them, I shall never blame them, for adhering to their friends. Be true to your friends, and they will be true to you, is the dictate both of justice and of sound policy. I shall never participate in abusing the Administration for remembering their friends. If you go too much abroad with this patronage, for the purpose of making new friends, you will offend your old ones, and make but very insincere converts.

But has the gentleman from Pennsylvania adverted to the consequences of his doctrine? There is no danger from patronage! If so, there is no occasion for jealousy on the part of the States, towards this Government. All the principles which actuated our fathers, which made them watch the Federal Government with Argus eyes, for the purpose of restraining it within the limits of the Constitution, were utterly vain. For my own part, judging from history, when this Government was commencing its operation, and when its patronage was comparatively small, it required the immense weight of character which the Father of his Country possessed, to put the wheels of the machine into successful motion. I think there was then more danger of a dissolution, than a consolidation of the confederacy. I should then, when the words had some meaning, have been a Federalist, rather than an anti-Federalist. I have been called a Federalist, and I shall never be ashamed of the name. The times have since greatly changed. The power and the patronage of this Government have been extended, and are felt in every neighbourhood of this vast empire. There is now infinitely more danger of consolidation than of disunion; and the States should now be jealous of every encroachment upon their rights. The argument of my colleague would put them to sleep. Upon his theory, the British Government must be very weak; because it possesses ten, nay, I might say twenty-fold the patronage of this Government.

I shall now approach another branch of my colleague's argument. I fully assent to his general proposition, that it is both our duty and our interest to cultivate friendly relations with every civilized nation; and for that purpose we should interchange with them ministers and diplomatic agents. Our ministers, when sent to a foreign court, should remain there, and not return home at the end of the year. The question upon which I would say, I should join issue with the gentleman, did this expression not "smell of the shop," is in what manner ought our ministers to appear abroad? Ours is the only pure Republican Government upon the earth. All our habits and our manners ought to be congenial to the simplicity and dignity of our institutions. Among men of sense abroad, our ministers, attired in the style of country gentlemen, would be more respectable, and more respected, than if they were bedizened in all the colors of the rainbow. In every attempt to ape the splendor of the representatives of monarchical Governments, we must fail. The veriest menial of the most contemptible court in Europe, who appears abroad in the character of a foreign minister, will be able to eclipse in dress and in finery, the representatives of the American People.

What was the example of the ancient Romans? In the days of their purity and their greatness, did they ever attempt to vie with the splendor of the Asiatic despots whom they subdued? Did they send ambassadors to the East, clothed in gorgeous apparel? No, they went in the simple dignity of Roman citizens, clothed with the majesty and power of the Roman People: and they carried respect for the Roman name, wherever they went. It was upon this model that Dr. Franklin acted, when he appeared as our minister at the Court of France, in the plain dress of a country gentleman. He would have deserved immortality for this act alone. He set an example from which his successors ought never to have departed.

What is now the case? The last Administration have prescribed a uniform to be worn by our foreign Ministers. It consists of a military coat, covered, and glittering with gold lace, the cost of which is not less than 500 dollars, and a chapeau and small sword, corresponding with it, in splendor! And this dress is what my colleague has called the livery of the American People, which our ministers ought to be proud to wear! I protest against this dress being called the livery of the American People. It is not so. It is the livery of the last, and the present Administration. No gentleman, who valued his standing with the People of this country, would ever appear before them in such a garb. The People of the United States do not even know that such a dress has been prescribed for their Ministers abroad. In many instances it must make us appear ridiculous in the eyes of foreign nations. Imagine to yourself a grave and venerable statesman, who never attended a militia training in his life, but who has been elevated to the station of a foreign Minister, in consequence of his civil attainments, appearing at Court, arrayed in this military coat, with a chapeau under his arm, and a small sword dangling at his side! Is not such a man compelled, by conforming to this regulation, to render himself ridiculous? "A military chieftain," who, in early life, had received his education at West Point, not the old "citizen soldier" who resides upon his farm, might sport a dress of this kind with some degree of grace; but what a ridiculous spectacle would a grave lawyer, or judge, of sixty years of age, present, arrayed in such a costume? If the salary of our foreign Ministers be not sufficient to enable them to exercise that liberal, but plain hospitality, which belongs to the character of their country, I say again, let it be increased; but let them never forget, in their dress, or in their manners, the simple grandeur which belongs to the character of Republicans. I trust, that, ere long, the days of Franklin will again return.

The gentleman has informed us, that it is his opinion we ought to be represented at the Congress of Tacubaya, should it ever assemble. Whatever I may have thought of the Mission, I most heartily approved of the selection of the Minister. For one, I shall never sanction any improper allusions made upon this floor to that gentleman, in relation to this Mission. There is no man in the ranks of the Administration, whom I should rather see promoted, nor is there any man among them more deserving of promotion. If he should ever again go to Tacubaya, I should regret to see him in any dress, but in that of an American gentleman. In that costume, he will infinitely better represent his own character, and that of the American People, than if he were decked out in all the splendid uniform prescribed by the Administration. He will then set an example of plainness and simplicity, which may be useful to the Republics of the South.

The gentleman has awarded the laurel crown, to deck the brow of the Military Chieftain; but has decreed the civic wreath to the statesman ripened by the experience of 40 years. He has informed us, he was no prophet; and I believe the fates will never confirm his decree. I trust and believe, that the People of the United States will elevate the 'citizen soldier' to the supreme magistracy of the Union. In that event, and after he shall have been tried by them, I venture to predict, that their award will entwine the civic wreath with the laurel crown; and that Jackson will live in the history of his country, as the man, of the present age, who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." I believe that the annals of the human race will furnish but few examples of men, who were endowed by nature with rare and distinguished military talents, without, at the same time, possessing the capacity for civil command. It would be easy to quote a splendid catalogue of names, in proof of this assertion; but I shall only mention those f Pericles, Cincinnatus, Charlemagne, Alfred, Henry the 4th of France, Napoleon—and, above all, our own unequalled Washington.

I shall now descend from the lofty heights to which we have been soaring, and make a few remarks upon the resolutions which have not been before the House, for several days past. I should have been opposed to their introduction, had I been consulted upon the subject. I should be willing, in this particular, to take the sagacity of the gentleman from Virginia as my guide. I agree with him, that it is not our business to originate any proposition, except such as have the necessary legislation of the country directly in view. The party in this House, opposed to the re-election of the present President, do not require any caucussing to direct their conduct. The path of policy, as well as duty, lies open before them. They ought to do the Legislative business of the country, and then go home, leaving the great question of the Presidential election to be decided by the American People. They will think more of us, if we should let it alone. For these reasons, I shall not vote, during the present session, in favor of considering either the amendments to the Constitution, or the constitutionality of the old Sedition Law, or any other subject which must necessarily divert our attention from the business of the nation, to the politics of the day. Had any question been taken, should not, at this time, have even voted in favor of considering the resolution to inquire into the expediency of placing a picture of the battle of New Orleans in the rotundo of the Capitol. As to the resolutions, to what do they amount? Do gentlemen suppose that the character of the Administration is to be tried by a Committee of Accounts? I believe that there are some supernumerary officers in the Departments; but I do not think that the salaries, of such as ought to be retained, are too high. In less than three years, the late war gave rise to an expenditure of $120,000,000, beyond the usual amount. After its close, there were an immense number of accounts to be settled, which produced a new organization of the Departments, to meet the necessity of the case. These accounts have nearly all been liquidated; but still all the new offices and clerkships, which were then created, continue to exist, and others have been added. This is not so much the fault of the Administration, as of Congress. A reduction in the number of these officers and clerks, and a more strict and economical application of the different contingent funds, to the purposes for which they were intended, embrace every thing which I expect the committee will be able to accomplish. They possibly may make some discoveries in relation to the past expenditures of the different contingent funds, which have not yet been brought before the House.

In conclusion, I must express my most sincere thanks to the House, for their polite attention; an attention which I do not, at any time, deserve; much less at this time, after they have been exhausted by so long and so fatiguing a debate.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1828.

The House again took up the resolution on Retrenchment.

Mr. RIVES, who was entitled to the floor on the adjournment of the previous day, rose, for the purpose of addressing the House; when,

Mr. RANDOLPH requested his colleague [Mr. RIVES] to yield him the floor for a few moments, while he made to the House a statement of fact. The House no doubt, recollect—I, sir, can never forget it: their polite attention has riveted it in my memory—some remarks of mine on Friday last. Yesterday morning, in consequence of rumours that were afloat in various directions, a friend of mine from North Carolina asked me if I had seen the United States' Telegraph, of Saturday last? I replied that I had not; for, though I am a subscriber to that paper, I rarely see it: it comes to me very irregularly. My friend said I had better look at it: for, it struck him, that there was something stated there not as I had said it. I did so; and my eye was first attracted to an article under what is called the editorial head, entitled "The Bargain." As soon as I had read it, I sat down, and addressed a note to the Editors, stating that an unwarranted and unwarrantable use had been made of my name. I state the substance of the note; and, in this part, the words also; and I added that the article purported to state what I had said, but not as I had said it. Sir, I hunted the whole Capitoline for the paper, before I could find one copy of Saturday's paper. At last, I got one from the other House. My eye was then attracted to the report of my remarks. Just at that moment, I was invited to an interview with the senior Editor, in an adjoining room, which invitation I did not accept. I preferred, sir, to stay, and listen to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BURCHAMAN.] I was then finishing a second hurried note, stating that I had, since my note of the morning, adverted to the report, and that it was obnoxious to the same objection as the Editorial article. On looking over it since then, I find that it is so, in a yet higher degree. I waited patiently to see whether any notice of the errors would be taken in this morning's paper; and I borrowed it at the house adjoining that in which I lodge. As no notice whatever is there taken of the matter, I think it due to myself and to the House to declare, that report not only presents my statement not as I said it, but it states what I did not say—[Here Mr. R. quoted the report]—"that there was no coalition until Mr. C's exclusion." Sir, I said no such thing. I said something that might have been mistaken for what is here. I know nothing of the motives of the statement, I care nothing for the motives—the motive does not affect the statement: it does affect the act, as it regards the agent; but not as it regards the object of that act. The effect to me is not altered, if a man blows my brains out, by his motives in doing it. That it was not until Mr. Crawford obstinately refused to die, and a certain candidate was excluded from the possibility of being elected, that the present incumbent became a party to the Coalition, or was taken into the firm. This is what I said: I said what I had said in the Senate two years ago: and I said what I did not say in the Senate two years ago. The whole tenor and tendency of this report is to make an impression on the public mind that I came forward here, with a certain knowing air, as if I were privy to some mighty thing, which other people did not know: as if I was tendering myself as a witness. Sir, I did no such thing. So far from volunteering as a witness, I had rather be excluded from giving testimony. I am not, certainly, an incompetent witness; and I should be the last man, most certainly, to impeach my own credibility: but I do not wish to press my testimony, for reasons which will be understood by every gentleman. But the tendency of that report, is, to lead the reader to believe that I spoke of certain things as having taken place—pendente lite—I mean while the Presidential election was pending. I said no such thing. This is what I said—that I had been told by the party in question that if we would give them (himself and his friends) any other person except John Q. Adams for President, they would support him. I state it over again with reluctance—I did not wish it to go abroad till it should go as I said it, and with all the concomitant facts and arguments to illustrate its meaning. I said that I had reason to know the sentiments of two certain parties in that business, concerning a third party. But, sir, I had no communication with either of them after my return from Europe. I neither said nor insinuated that I had. What I spoke of happened prior to my voyage to Europe. I spoke of a subject which was matter of general notoriety—and I spoke of it as personally known to me: it was personally known to me. I mentioned, too, how I got the knowledge of it. I did not want the knowledge; but in cases like this, as in all other cases, I like to act on the highest possible evidence, and that highest possible evidence is to me the evidence of my own senses. I had other evidence of it besides. The evidence was abundant and superabundant. I speak of the opinion held by the first and the second man now in this Administration, respecting each other. It was so notorious, that they may have been paid to have put their hands and seals to that opinion, and to have published it to the world. Sir, if there is any thing which can do mischief, it is such reports and such editorial remarks. I am personally ignorant of one of the Editors. I never spoke but to one of them (the senior editor) in my life; and that was once, this session, on the steps of this Capitol, when, in reply to his address, I bade him "good morning." This has been the whole of our intercourse. Sir, if any thing can do away the effect of statements made here, it is such exaggeration, or such careless misrepresentation as this. If I were to put my hand to that statement, I should put my hand to what is not true: for, as sure as I hold this paper in my hand, the statement in it is false—[throwing the paper on the floor.] I said no such thing, as every body knows that took the trouble to listen to me. I spoke of an agreement, or an understanding—call it what you will—between the two high contracting parties—neither of whom is the President of the United States—which took place long previously to a certain event, and long previously to its being ascertained that one of those parties was excluded, as a candidate, from the House of Representatives. The evidences of it were given on this floor, in the contest which took place between one of those parties and another, whom I had almost called his colleague: for they had represented the same State and town. It was given in another way, both before and after my departure for Europe—in a manner not to be misunderstood. This instance was before I went to Europe, in 1824. I did not know of the fact of his exclusion till after my return, in Dec. 1824. The first news I heard of it was from Capt. Fish, who came down in the Steam Boat, with his usual attention and cordiality, and greeted me on my return: he gave me the first news that Jackson was ahead of all—and that there was every reason to believe that Clay would not come into the House. I had no communication with either of these high contracting parties after that—[except one—of a certain sort with one of them, [Mr. W.] which was finished to my entire satisfaction] during that session. Yes, I had—once in the room which is called yours, Sir—I was covering over the fire on the morning of the election, and then believing that New York would not give her vote for the present President—the Speaker came in, and I said to him, "I hope we shall not be kept long a balloting." He no doubt smiled at my simplicity. Sir, what I said on Friday, I shall put in black and white—as soon as I have time to correct certain minutes, or whatever else they are called, that is if they are corrigible. Sir, that compact, or understanding between the two high parties, was long anterior to the time when either of them thought of the present President as the successor to Mr. Monroe. To believe that it then had for its object the elevation of the present incumbent, one must suppose, that one of the parties, who was himself a candidate, wanted to defeat his own election. Sir, it is a simple case of reductio ad absurdum—not one of those we have lately seen—in which the Speaker himself, and not the proposition, was reduced ad absurdum. Yet we must suppose so, if the individual I spoke of would have a communication with Eastern gentlemen early in 1834, with a view to put the present President into the chair. Sir, it is so absurd, that there is not a child who can be brought to believe it, even by the help of sugar candy—[putting a bit into his mouth.] Our intercourse was merely casual, when he used the expression I mentioned. Sir, this is not the first, or the second, or the third time, that I have had occasion to complain of the same paper, and have written to the editors to that effect. On a late occasion, I said, "do able and practised statesmen believe that if they trump, their adversaries will not trump too? Why, sir, Hoyle might have taught them better." The report in that paper made me say, "why, sir, Hoyle, their own favorite book of games, might have taught them better." Who does not see that this takes off the point entirely? Sir, it makes that flat, and coarse; and vulgar, and base, which I maintain was strictly parliamentary, and not without point. With one exception—that about the Irish—and that is one where I should have thought no man could have misunderstood me—with that one exception, sir, I have not seen one report in that paper, of any remarks of mine, (one only, which I corrected for it,) which has not filled me with disgust. And I feel the more indignant at it, because those reports are copied into other opposition papers. Sir, even that report about the Irish, with the single exception referred to, was a miserable report—I do not say there was prepossessive malice—I do not believe that there was any—but I do say that it was a most wretched report. Sir, I must here notice another journal, on another occasion. During a certain debate here, I spoke of a bull having been fulminated. Well, sir, the printers had that, "by those under whose orders militiamen had been shot, a bill." During the same debate, while a member [Mr. WAIGHT] was speaking on the other side of the House, I was told that I had been misinformed in the statement I had made in relation to the shooting of militiamen at Norfolk. Now, sir, such is my horror of stating as a fact that which is not a fact, that I rose immediately, interrupted a member in an argument which had no reference to that subject, and with all the distinctness of articulation of which I am capable, I made an explanation, taking back what I had before stated, before it could be noticed any where, in relation to the shooting of the militiamen—and said that I did not wish it to go abroad without the correction. I expected that this counter statement would appear in the papers next day; but it was only said, that Mr. RAYBOLDS said a few words in explanation. This was on Saturday—Sunday is a blank day, as we used to say when I was a fox-hunter—that statement got to Richmond on Sunday afternoon. The error could not be corrected sooner than Monday, and would reach Richmond on Tuesday—here, sir, were forty-eight hours for the mischief to brew in. The party referred to was a man of gallantry, and a man of honor—to say more is unnecessary.

Sir, I am not imputing motives—the motives are nothing to me—but if this misrepresentation had not appeared, the House should not now have heard any thing from me. If the printers would only let us alone, sir—but I know no public man can exist an hour without the press, and I, sir, am a public man. Sir, I am conscious I have stated that imperfectly and lamely, which I thought I could state very clearly in six words; but I shall only serve as a foil to my colleague, on whose courtesy, as well as that of the House, I have trespassed too long, and will now hear him with pleasure.

Mr. RIVES said, that, in embarking upon the wide ocean of debate which lay before him, he hardly knew from what point to take his departure, or in what direction to steer his course. But, as some chart was indispensably necessary, on so extensive a voyage, he would endeavor to take the resolutions upon the table for his guide, with no other deviations than the stress of antecedent debate should unavoidably force him into. In pursuings this course of discussion, he should very much regret if any thing he might say should excite a single unpleasant sensation in the bosom of any member of the House, or be considered, in any degree, indecorous or disrespectful towards any member of the Government. I may truly affirm, said Mr. R. that I entertain none other than the kindest feelings for every gentleman with whom I have the honor to be associated upon this floor; and towards the members of the Administration, however much I may be politically opposed to them, I have never harbored the slightest sentiment of ill-will or personal antipathy. But, as guardians of the public weal, and sentinels of the public liberty, it sometimes becomes our duty here to speak unpalatable truths. In doing so, I have always endeavored to separate the private from the public characters of persons in office; and while I reserve to myself, at all times, every legitimate freedom of remark upon their official conduct, I hope I shall never say any thing which would be a just cause of personal offence to them or their friends.

In this spirit, I proceed to the consideration of the resolutions upon the table. There are two features common to all the propositions. They all contemplate an inquiry into the expediency of retrenching the future expenses of the Government, and an examination into its past disbursements. Sir, I am decidedly friendly to both of these objects. But as a means of effecting them, I prefer the resolution recently submitted by my friend from South-Carolina, [Mr. HAMILTON] because it is more specific and practical in its character, and because it proposes to employ the instrumentality of a special, instead of a Standing Committee. Sir, I am persuaded, from the extent and magnitude of the inquiry, that it cannot be satisfactorily conducted by any of the Standing Committees, already burthened with pre-existing duties. I hope, therefore, that the proposition of the gentleman from S. Carolina, will receive the support of every one who has the cause of retrenchment really at heart.

Though it is rather old-fashioned doctrine, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who have the cause of retrenchment really at heart. I believe there is great occasion for it. It is now twenty-five years since there has been any systematic reformation in the organization and expenses of the several Departments of the Government. The reformation I allude to, was at the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, when it was thorough and complete. Considering the tendency of all Governments to abuse, to the accumulation of unnecessary expenses, and the incumbrance of useless offices, I cannot doubt that there has arisen much since that period which requires correction. The tree of Executive patronage is continually throwing out new shoots and branches, which as constantly call for the application of the pruning-knife.

While the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] assented to the general tendency of all Governments to abuse, he said, that the abuse to which this Government was most prone, was the abuse of parsimony. Sir, this idea is contradicted by the whole history of the operations of the Government; and a little reflection will, I think, satisfy the gentleman himself that his notion is fallacious. How are the expenses of this Government supplied? By direct impositions upon the great body of the people? No, sir, if this were the case, it would be some check upon the extravagance of the Government. In the State Governments, whenever a new expenditure is authorized, the means of meeting that expenditure must be provided by direct taxation upon the People. The tax-gatherer goes annually to the citizen, and exacts from him his share of the public contributions. If he finds that share greater than it was the year before, he knows by whose act it is so; he demands of his Representative the reason for it; and unless that reason is satisfactory, he dismisses him, and chooses another. It is this direct and undisguised operation of the system of public revenue, under the State Governments, which renders the Representative practically and constantly responsible to his constituents, and this responsibility is a sufficient security against prodigality in the Government.

But, in this Government, the revenue which supplies the public expenditures, is not drawn into the Treasury directly from the pockets of the People, although they ultimately pay it. They pay it, however, in the shape of an increased price for the commodities they consume; and instead of tracing that increase of price to an act of the Government, they generally look no farther than the merchant with whom they deal. In this way, the imposition is disguised, and the Representative is screened from responsibility. Hence it is, that we vote millions of dollars here, with not so much hesitation or compunction as we vote thousands in the State Legislatures. It is for this reason, that the tendency of this Government, so long as the national revenue is derived principally from external duties, will be to profusion and extravagance; and not, as the gentleman from Massachusetts supposes, to parsimony.

These general considerations sufficiently indicate to my mind, the necessity of some revision of the expenses of the Government, with a view to retrenchment. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHERMAN] said, that some basis ought to be laid for the inquiry. What, sir! does the gentleman require actual proof of the existence of abuses? This proof cannot be had without inquiry. If, then, we can take no initiatory measure, for the correction of abuses, without previous proof of their existence; as that proof cannot be had without inquiry, and as, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, no inquiry on the subject ought to be made without proof, abuses must ever remain uncorrected. The effect of the doctrine is to shelter the abuses of Government with an inviolable sanctuary.

But, sir, the honorable gentleman suggested another reason against this inquiry, which surprised me no less. He said he would not move such an inquiry, because it was calculated to weaken the affections of the People for the Government, (not the Executive Department more, but the whole Government) by giving sanction to the idea that there are abuses here. Sir, I would respectfully submit it to that gentleman, whether the affections and confidence of the People will be most weakened by the suppression of inquiry, and thereby producing upon the public mind the impression that we are disposed to connive at, and acquiesce in, abuses, or by pursuing inquiry to show a determination either to purify the Government from abuses, if they exist, or to clear it of the odium and suspicion of them, if they do not exist.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania took still bolder ground. He not only said that there was no sufficient proof of abuses calling for reform, but he attempted to show, that, in fact, there are no abuses, and that the administration of the Government is distinguished by extraordinary economy. Sir, how did he make this out? By reviewing the fiscal operations of the Government for the last twelve years, from 1815 to 1827, and exhibiting their accumulated results. He told us that, within that period, seventy millions of the public debt had been paid off, besides maintaining the Army, the Navy, the Civil list, and all the other branches of the public service; and seemed to rely upon this as a conclusive proof of the economical administration of our finances. Sir, the first remark which occurs upon this statement is, that, admitting its sufficiency as evidence of economy, it does not prove, what is the only matter with which we have any concern, that the Administration of the Government is, at the present time, an economical one. It could prove only, that, in times past, there has been economy!

But, sir, I waive this objection, and will go back with the honorable gentleman in his retrospect. Is it not a little singular, that, while the gentleman was telling us of the amount of debt which had been paid off, and the expenses which had been met by the Government, as evidence of its economy, it did not occur to him that he ought to have told us something of the means which had been put at its disposal, for the accomplishment of these objects? Economy, sir, is a relative thing; it depends on the proportion between the results which have been accomplished, and the resources which have been furnished for accomplishing them.

Now, sir, what were the resources of the Government during those twelve years, from which the honorable gentleman has collected the results he so fondly displayed to the admiration of the House? Why, sir, more than 300 millions of dollars. During several years of the period included in the honorable gentleman's retrospect, we had direct taxes, and a system of internal revenue; and from those sources, added to the customs, the sales of public lands, and the bank bonus and dividends, the whole revenue which flowed into the public Treasury, from 1815 to 1827, considerably exceeded 300 millions of dollars! Now, sir, with such a fund as this at its disposal, is it proof, either of extraordinary frugality, or of consummate financial skill in the Government, to have paid off 70 millions of the debt, and defrayed its current expenses?

The average annual receipts of the Government, during this period, amounted to more than 25 millions. We will suppose that about 10 millions were annually applied to the principal and interest of the public debt. The ordinary current expenses of the Government may have amounted to about another sum of 10 millions annually; and there then remained a sum of 5 millions to be expended ad libitum. How the honorable gentleman can deduce, from these facts, an evidence of the economy of the Government, I cannot conceive.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania exhibited another view of this subject, for the purpose of showing us how lightly we are taxed for the support of our institutions. He told us that the whole expenditure of the Government, for the year 1826, was 24 millions of dollars, which, assessed upon our twelve millions of population, produces a charge of only two dollars a head, while, according to a statement he made, the taxation of the British People amounts to fifteen dollars a head. Observing, (in passing merely,) that the gentleman has stated the amount of public burthens in Great Britain, enormous as they certainly are, at a higher rate than I have ever seen any authority for, I think I shall be able to satisfy him, that he has put our own much too low. His statement pretermits several important items, which undoubtedly enter largely into our complicated system of public burthens.

He seemed to assume the amount of duties paid to the Government, as the full measure of American taxation. But, Sir, this is not so. It is true that the proceeds of the duties are all which the Government receives, but they are not all that the People pay. The merchant, who pays the duties to the Government in advance, must have his profit upon that advance included in the price of the goods; and this profit, repeated and multiplied through a series of exchanges, amounts, at last, to a heavy tax upon the consumer, over and above the amount of duties paid to the Government. The ordinary amount of duties is twenty-odd millions, and the usual mercantile profit, of from 33, to 50 per cent. upon that sum, would raise the whole charge, imposed by the General Government, to about thirty millions of dollars. But to ascertain the full amount of public burthens sustained by the People of this country, you must also take into the account the taxes imposed by the State Governments, with all their subordinate local jurisdictions, comprehending, besides the general revenue of the State, the county levies, the parish rates, and numerous other public exactions of one sort or another, which have been estimated by a most able statistic, as well as statesman, [Col. BENTON, of the Senate,] at a round sum of twenty millions of dollars more.

We have thus a grand total of fifty millions of dollars, instead of twenty-odd millions, for the amount of public contributions levied upon the People of this country which, deducting from our population, two millions for slaves who pay nothing, makes a charge upon the residue, of five, instead of two dollars a head. Now, Sir, this does appear to me to be an enormous load of taxation, even for a much older People than we are; and, accordingly one of the most profound politicians of the old world, the celebrated Talleyrand, (as has been stated elsewhere by the gentleman to whom I have already alluded,) in graduating the actual taxation of different countries, has placed us upon the scale in a middle position between Great Britain, the most heavily taxed, and France, the next most heavily taxed country, (but for the exception he makes of us,) in the world.

But, Sir, the comparison which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made between this country and Great Britain, for the purpose of showing the relative moderation of our public burthens, is obviously unfair, in many respects. The British Government is now nearly eight centuries old, and during that time has been engaged in a long succession of wars, foreign or domestic, which have accumulated upon it an immense mass of public debt. To pay the interest of this debt, and whatever portion of its principal it may, and at the same time to support the cumbrous and expensive establishments which result from its political organization, it must impose upon its subjects a weight of taxation equal to their utmost capacity to bear. But our situation is altogether different. Our national existence hardly extends beyond half a century, and the simplicity of our republican institutions neither requires nor tolerates the costly appendages which belong to other Governments. The public debt of Great Britain amounts, at this moment, between three and four thousand millions of dollars; an amount more than fifty times greater than our national debt. Now, as the burthens imposed by every Government, must be in proportion to the charges existing upon it, I would ask, with what propriety a comparison can be made between Great Britain and this country, under these widely different circumstances, with a view to test the economy of our Government?

But, Sir, I protest altogether against comparisons with Foreign Governments. Our institutions, our situation, moral and physical, the genius and habits of our People, are all peculiar. They are sui generis. In having the freest Government in the world, we are entitled, by the favor of Providence, to the greatest share of public blessings; and among them, that we should not be subjected to a relentless taxation which takes "from the mouth of labor, the bread it has earned." In what consists the value of a free Government, if it is not that, by the constant influence and control of the will of the People over their rulers, the Government is restrained from oppression, pecuniary as well as personal? Sir, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania did not tell us to what a situation the People of Great Britain had been reduced by their public burthens—of the number of their paupers and starvelings—that two-fifths of the whole population of that country were kept alive by being billeted upon the constrained charity of the remaining three fifths.

Would the worthy gentleman have us esteem ourselves, happy, and without any cause to complain of governmental exactions, as long as we can keep within the limit of this extremity of wretchedness? I hope not, Sir. I have long thought, Mr. Speaker, if I may venture to express such an opinion, that there is too great a disposition among ome of our distinguished Statesmen to bring our affairs, our policy and our principles, to the standard of Foreign Governments. A prominent feature in the celebrated first Message of the present Chief Magistrate to Congress, was its perpetual fond recurrence to the proceedings of Foreign Governments, as the lesson of our political duties, and the measure of our political powers. He told us what France, what Russia, what Great Britain had done, and gave us to understand that we should go and do likewise. Now, Sir, to all this I object, as anti-American—as anti-Republican. Our circumstances and our institutions are peculiar, and so too should be our policy.

[H. or R.]

But, Sir, to return to the subject of our public expenditures. I would say to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the true mode of testing the economy of our Government, at any given period, is not to compare its expenses with those of a Foreign Government, but with its own at some antecedent period. Now, Sir, if we do this we shall find that, during Mr. Jefferson's Administration, in 1802, for example, the whole expenditures of the Government, exclusive of the payments of the public debt, amounted to $3,737,079, while the same class of expenditures, during the year 1826, according to the last Treasury report, amounted to $13,062,316. Here, then we have an increase of expenditure equal to 350 per cent, in less than 25 years, which, after making every allowance for the growth of the country, and the expansion of its institutions, does seem to me to be disproportionate and extravagant.

Sir, I have dwelt the longer upon these views, because I have a deep and settled conviction, that economy is a cardinal virtue in every Republican Government. It is not merely for the pecuniary saving, and the consequent relief to the industry and resources of the People, which it brings with it, that I esteem it. It is still more for its political effects. It is not only the close ally, but the surest guarantee of the public liberty. It is the great instrument for restraining that dangerous principle of Executive influence, which is perpetually undermining and assailing the fabric of free Government every where, and of our own not less than others. This influence exerts and enlarges itself through the disbursements of public money, ultimately under one shape or another. Diminish the public expenditure, then, and you at the same time diminish Executive influence.

Sir, I may have fears upon this subject, which firmer minds can and do repel; but it has long been my opinion, that there is a decided tendency in our Government to a dangerous and disproportionate accumulation of power in the Executive branch, and that Monarchy is the euthanasia of our political system. Gentlemen who treat these fears as altogether visionary, and those especially, who like, the distinguished member from Pennsylvania, consider patronage a disadvantage, rather than an aid to an Administration, have not, I am persuaded, explored the full extent and range of this powerful engine, in the magnitude which it has, at present, attained. Having been led, by particular circumstances, during the last session of Congress, to look into this subject, I will repeat here the result of an investigation then very carefully made. Many persons have hastily supposed that the patronage of the Executive consisted exclusively in appointments to office. But an equally, if not more important branch of patronage, consists in the disposition of public moneys through the medium of contracts made under the direction of the Executive. Both of these branches were included in an estimate of the amount of Executive patronage, made by Mr. Gallatin in '99, and I took the list of items, enumerated by him, as the basis of my calculation.

In doing this, I found that the "annual pay of the officers in the several Departments of the Treasury, State, War, and Navy, and their dependencies; of the Attorney General, and Postmaster General, Judges, Marshals, and District Attorneys, Officers of the Customs, Postmasters; of Diplomatic characters, Commercial Agents, (exclusive of Consuls,) Commissioners under Treaties, Territorial Officers, Indian Agents, Surveyors, Registers, Receivers, &c.;" in fine, the pay of all Civil Officers, whose appointments depend upon the Executive, added to the commissioned officers of the Army and Navy, amounted to about $3,500,000; and that the amount of moneys disposed of by contracts made under the direction of the Executive, including Fortifications, Docks, Navy Yards, Internal Improvements, Light-houses, transportation of the Mail, supplying the provisions, clothing, guns, cannon, &c. for the Army, building ships, and furnishing supplies necessary for the Navy, was about $4,500,000; making an aggregate of eight millions annually: four times the amount of Executive patronage, as estimated by Mr. Gallatin in '99.

Now, Sir, when the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania comes to survey this immense field, so productive in rich rewards, he can no longer, I am sure, consider its possession a disadvantage to those who enjoy it. He will see that, although the hopes of an expectant may be sometimes disappointed, in relation to a particular office, yet that, in the multiplicity of other boons and favors to be disposed of, ample means are afforded to retain his fidelity, and to console and indemnify him for his first disappointment.

Believing this immense force of Executive patronage to be dangerous to the public liberty, and as the disbursements of public money must necessarily be made by the Executive branch of the Government, that every increase of expenditure tends directly to increase the influence of that Department, I am for embracing every fit occasion to reduce the public expenditure to the real demands of the public service. It is with reference to this great political object, that I attach so much importance to a wise economy in the administration of our public affairs. When Mr. Burke proposed his great scheme of economical reform, he did not look merely to the saving of money, though that was something to a People groaning beneath the weight of their public burthens—but he looked beyond, to the higher object of diminishing, through the instrumentality of pecuniary retrenchment, the dangerous and growing influence of the Crown. When, in the same memorable year, Mr. Dunning submitted his celebrated resolution, affirming that the "influence of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished," he submitted by the side of it, another resolution, affirming it to be the right and the duty of the House of Commons to examine into, and correct abuses, in the expenditure of the public revenue, and declared that both propositions stood upon one great principle.

Sir, there was a period in the history of our own country, when these doctrines were not only avowed, but practised. I allude, Sir, to the Presidency of Mr. Jefferson, which I have ever looked back to as the purest era of our Government—as the era of sound principles and of correct practices. As I hope the doctrines of that day will once again, at no very remote period, come into favor, and as they are particularly applicable to the subject of our present deliberations, I must beg permission to read a beautiful development of them in the words of their great teacher.

In his first official communication to Congress, he held the following language:

"These views are formed on the expectation that a sensible, and, at the same time, a salutary reduction, may take place in our habitual expenditures. For this purpose, those of the Civil Government, the Army, and Navy, will need revival. When we consider that this Government is charged with the external and mutual relations only of these States; that the States themselves have the principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns, we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive—whether offices and officers have not been multiplied unnecessarily, and sometimes injuriously to the service they were meant to promote. I will cause to be laid before you an essay towards a statement of those who, under the public employment of various kinds, draw money from the Treasury, or from our citizens. Time has not permitted a perfect enumeration, the ramifications of office being too multiplied and too remote to be completely traced in a first trial. Among those who are dependent on Executive discretion, I have begun the reduction of what was deemed unnecessary. The expenses of diplomatic agency have been considerably diminished. The inspectors of internal revenue, who were found to obstruct the accountability of the institution, have been discontinued. Several agencies, created by the Executive authority, on salaries fixed by that also, have been suppressed, and should suggest the expediency of regulating that power by law, so as to subject its exercise to the legislative inspection and sanction. Other reformatorys of the same kind will be pursued, with that caution which is requisite, in removing useless things, not to injure what is retained. But the great mass of public offices is established by law, and, therefore, by law alone can be abolished. Should the Legislature think it expedient to pass this roll in review, and to try all its parts by the test of public utility, they may be assured of every aid and light which Executive information can yield. Considering the general tendency to multiply officers and dependencies, and to increase expense to the ultimate term of burthen which the citizen can bear, it behoves us to avail ourselves of every occasion which presents itself for taking off the surcharge; that it never may be seen here, that, after leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings, on which it can subsist, Government shall itself consume the residue of what it was instituted to guard. In our case, too, of the public contributions entrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money; and by bringing back to a single department, all accountabilities for money, where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform."

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I had always regarded the Administration of Mr. Jefferson as the purest and brightest era of our Government. Is not the pregnant extract, which I have just read from his first message to Congress, sufficient evidence, in itself, of the justness of this praise? It is possible to conceive a nobler spectacle than he presented on that occasion? The Chief Magistrate of a nation voluntarily divesting himself, by his own act, where it was competent for him to do so, of every attribute of his power, which, however advantageous to himself, he deemed to be inconsistent with the public interest; and in cases where it was not competent for him to apply the remedy, calling upon the legislative authority to do so, by reducing his patronage, circumscribing his discretion, and defining his powers! Sir, the spectacle is rare as it was noble. If it was not presumption in me, I would venture to recommend it to the imitation of the distinguished individuals who now preside over the administration of our public affairs. They might find it, perhaps, the most effectual means of acquiring present popularity, as it certainly would be of earning true glory for the future. But they seem to have taken a different view of what became their situation.

Their whole course has been in striking contrast with the self-denying republicanism of Mr. Jefferson. Instead of renouncing the exercise of power which the laws and the Constitution had given them, we have seen them laying claim to powers which are sanctioned by neither; instead of the suppression of unnecessary offices, and the curtailment of Executive patronage, we have seen them rapidly multiplied and increased, under their auspices; instead of recommending the limitation of Executive discretion over the public disbursements, we have seen them asking for large grants of public money, to be expended at their mere will and pleasure. To descend a little more into detail—let me ask if "the expenses of diplomatic agency have been considerably diminished?" It is notorious that they have increased, and I shall presently attempt to give some idea of the extent of that increase. Have "any agencies, created by Executive authority, on salaries fixed by that also, been suppressed?" Let the secret history of the Executive Departments give the answer.

What respect has been paid by the present Administration to those great maxims of fiscal responsibility, inculcated by Mr. Jefferson? Have they been willing to acquiesce in the doctrine of "appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition?" For an answer, I refer to an estimate of one of the Departments; in which, to effect a survey of roads and canals of national importance, which may surely be defined, if any thing be susceptible of definition, we are asked to appropriate a sum of $50,000—it was $30,000 last year—for the survey of such routes as the President may think proper to denominate national. Have they shown more respect for another of those maxims, that which enjoins a "disallowance of all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount?" There is now a communication upon our tables from the Head of another of the Departments, seeking to be emancipated from this restraint, and asking for the privilege of transferring appropriations from one object of expenditure to another. Has there been a disposition manifested in the estimates of any of the Departments, to "reduce the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribe discretionary powers over money?" Sir, it will be found that this "field of contingencies," instead of being reduced by the present Administration, has been greatly extended, and that "the discretionary powers of the Executive over the public money," have been proportionally enlarged. Some of the items in this increase of "contingencies," I shall have occasion to bring more particularly to the notice of the House.

As I have thus ventured, Mr. Speaker, to present myself in the unfashionable, if not invidious character, of an economist, I must be permitted to state, somewhat more in detail, what are my notions upon this subject. Though the advocate of economy, I am not, Sir, the advocate of a niggardly parsimony. I would do away all sinecure places; all supernumerary offices, which serve no other purpose than to be snug receptacles for court favorites, and channels of Executive influence. But, in relation to officers who are really necessary to the public service, I would give them liberal compensations. I know not, at this moment, a solitary officer, whose salary I would reduce. I would touch the salary only through the office; and by one and the same act, wherever I found a sinecure, or a mere nominal employment, I would sweep both the salary and the office. In regard to those great public establishments essential to the security of the country, I would maintain them all in a state of salutary vigor and efficiency; but as the best means of doing that, I would endeavor to free them from incumbrance, and to purge them from abuse in every branch of their Administration. This, Sir, is my idea of public economy.

Sir, I have been very much surprised that this proposition of retrenchment has been so promptly met as an attack upon the present Administration. Are they not friends of economy? The President has given us the amplest professions upon this subject—even of a “strict” and “vigilant” economy. Do his friends distrust his sincerity, or does their sensibility, on the present occasion, arise from the proposed inquiry into the disbursements of the Government? Sir, this is made our duty annually, by the Standing Rules and Orders of the House. It is a duty imposed upon us by a still higher authority—that of the Constitution itself; which requires that “a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money, shall be published from time to time.” Now, sir, to make this published statement of the expenditures of public money what it was designed to be, a check on extravagance and abuse, it must, sometimes, at least, embrace particulars and details which can be elicited only by special inquiry.

But an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVANS] seemed to think that we had no rightful authority to enquire into the expenditure of one of the funds embraced by the proposed enquiry—the fund for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. He seemed to think that this fund was put into the hands of the President as the constitutional organ of our intercourse with foreign nations, and that as such he had a right to dispose of it in any manner he pleased, without disclosing the particulars of its expenditure to any one, and that, by the proposed enquiry, we should invade a high prerogative of the Presidential office. Sir, I will first remark that this objection proceeds from a misapprehension in point of fact. None of the resolutions call for the particulars of the expenditures out of this fund. They only ask for the respective amounts of what has been expended out of this fund, and settled at the Treasury, without any specification of the nature of the expenditure, and of what has been expended and settled, in the usual way, upon specific vouchers. The law authorizes the President to cause the expenditures out of this fund to be settled at the Treasury, “by specially accounting for the same, in all instances wherein the expenditure may, in his judgment be made public;” and in other instances “by merely making a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable not to specify.” Now, sir, the resolutions under consideration ask only for the aggregates of these two classes of expenditures; and do not seek a disclosure of the particular items of either. There is, therefore, no foundation, in point of fact, for considering these resolutions as invading any prerogative of the President, even if the doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts were correct.

But, sir, as I consider that doctrine altogether erroneous, and of dangerous consequence to the legitimate functions of this House, I beg leave here to protest against it. It was once contended in England, that the House of Commons had no right to inquire into the expenditure of the civil list revenue, because that was to be regarded in the nature of a private and personal grant to the King, subject exclusively to his own discretion. There was a plausible ground for that claim in England, inasmuch as the civil list revenue is always settled upon the King, at his accession, for life. But even there, it has been long since repudiated, and abandoned by Ministers themselves, and the civil list revenue, as well as every other branch of the public revenue, is held to be a trust, in the hands of the sovereign, subject at all times, to examination and control by the Representatives of the People. If this be the acknowledged doctrine in England, in relation to a monarch holding his power independently of any express act of consent on the part of the People, how much more applicable is it to a Government like ours, where the Chief Magistrate is the immediate creature and servant of the public will and responsible for all his acts?

This idea of the responsibility of the President, in regard to the disbursements of what is commonly called “the secret service” fund, is founded upon a total misconception of the act of Congress, to which I have already referred. That act of Congress, properly considered, does not vest any right in the President. It only conveys an authority to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and empowers them to credit disbursements of public money, in certain cases, without specific vouchers, which, otherwise, they would not have been authorized to credit. Hence, the concluding declaration of the law, that, in cases of secret service, the mere “certificate of the President shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum or sums therein expressed to have been expended.” The true purpose and effect of the law, is to protect the President from disclosing the nature of his expenditures out of this fund, to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and not from communicating them to the Representatives of the People, in their high official character, as the grand inquest of the nation, if they deem it expedient to call for them. This power of Congress is an inherent and fundamental right of the People, and can never be abandoned in principle, without betraying the interests and privileges of our constituents. How far it may be safe and prudent to exercise it, is another question—one of mere discretion, which must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case, as it shall arise.

Believing it to be the right and the duty of this House, at all times, to institute any inquiries it may deem necessary into the disbursements of public money, I should vote for the present inquiry upon general principles alone. But I confess, sir, I have a further reason for giving my assent to the proposed investigation, in the present instance. I find that much larger sums have been furnished to the present Administration, on account of all the funds embraced in the scope of this inquiry, than were furnished to the Administration which preceded it; and hence it seems to me to be particularly proper, that we should inquire what has created the necessity for these increased supplies, and in what manner they have been disposed of. For the purpose of exhibiting this difference more distinctly to the House, I have compiled from our appropriation laws, a comparative statement, showing the sums appropriated for the contingent expenses of the several Departments, and the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, during the three last years of the last Administration, to wit, 1822, 1823, and 1824; and the sums appropriated for the same objects during the three years of the present Administration, to wit, 1825, 1826, and 1827. Retirement.

From this exhibit, it will be seen, that the total amount of appropriations for each of the contingent funds in question, for the three years of the present Administration, has greatly exceeded the total amount of the appropriations for the same funds, during the last three years of the preceding Administration; presenting, in the aggregate, an increase of little less than 50 per cent. To this table, I have subjoined a statement of the appropriations for the whole expenses of foreign intercourse, both regular and contingent, for the same periods, exhibiting an increase of corresponding extent, in that branch of the public service, under the present Administration. I have included the appropriation for foreign intercourse generally, because that is a subject particularly referred by the Constitution and the practice of the Government, to the discretion of the Executive; and for the regulation of its expenses, therefore, the Executive is particularly responsible.

Some gentlemen may, upon the first blush, account for the great difference in the appropriations for this branch of the public service, under the present and late Administrations, by referring it to the opening of our diplomatic intercourse with the South American States. But it so happens, that that intercourse was opened several years before the commencement of the present Administration; and that, in the very first year embraced by the statement, to wit, in 1822, a sum of one hundred thousand dollars was appropriated, by a separate law, for defraying the expense of missions to the independent nations of South America. The comparison, then, is altogether fair, embracing two equal periods of time, when the circumstances of the country, in its foreign relations, were as similar as they well could be. The other subjects of comparison in the foregoing table, are confined to contingent appropriations, because, in the disbursement of them, the Executive and its officers have an unlimited discretion, and must, therefore, be held exclusively responsible for excessive or improper expenditures.

Before I take my leave of this table I will call the attention of the House to a fact disclosed by it, in connexion with a vaunting remark made by a friend of the Administration, [Mr. PEARCE] a few days ago. He claimed great credit for the Administration, that they asked no appropriation for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, during the present year; and either he or some other gentleman gave us to understand that such a thing had not happened before, since the origin of the Government. Certain it is that I have seen this statement made in a tone of great confidence and self-applause, in several leading journals devoted to the support of the Administration. Now, sir, we are not under the necessity of travelling very far back, for a refutation of this assertion: for it so happens, that, in two out of three years of the last Administration, embraced by the statement I have exhibited, there was no such appropriation. The years 1822 and 1823, it will be seen, present perfect blanks as to this appropriation. If we go farther back, we shall find long tracts of time, during which there was no such appropriation. For four or five successive years of Mr. Jefferson's Administration there was none.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that the large increase in the supplies granted by Congress to the present Administration, for these objects, rendered it particularly proper that we should inquire into their disbursement. I do not mean to say (because I have no knowledge upon the subject) that there has been any thing wrong in that disbursement; nor do I mean to say, that the actual expenditure has been equal to the appropriations. But as we all know that the appropriations made by Congress are founded upon estimates, furnished by the several Departments of what they will require for their respective operations, the appropriations made must be regarded as a fair criterion for ap-proximating, at least, the actual expenditures of the Government. If the increase of expenditure, in the several branches of the public service, embraced by the statement I have exhibited, has not kept equal pace with the increase of appropriations, I have seen enough to satisfy me that that increase has, at least, been very considerable, under the present Administration.

The aggregate expenditures of the Government have notoriously increased. I here speak of its ordinary current expenditures, by which I mean all expenditures, except payments on account of the public debt, and demands arising from treaties with foreign nations. Those expenditures, in 1822, were $9,827,642; in 1823, $9,784,152; in 1824, $10,448,779, making a total sum, during the three last years of the last administration, of $30,060,573. In 1825, the same class of expenditures amounted to $11,416,582; in 1826, to $13,062,316; 1827, to $12,285,530, making a total sum during the three years of the present Administration, of $36,764,428. The increase of the ordinary expenditures of the Government, under the present Administration, compared with a corresponding period of the last Administration, has amounted, then, to an annual sum of $2,234,618.

Now, Sir, I do not mean to hold the Executive responsible for the whole of this increase of the public expenditure; but as their friends are ever ready to claim for them the credit of whatever good has been done since they came into power, it is but fair that they should bear a portion of the blame for the evil which may have been committed. We are perpetually told of the sixteen millions of the principal of the public debt, which have been extinguished under the present Administration, as an evidence of their good management, and as if the merit belonged personally and exclusively to them. If they are to have the whole credit of this operation, they must submit to bear a portion, at least, of the blame which may be imputed for not doing more. The statement which I have just made, shows that if the expenditures of the Government under the present Administration, had been kept within the limit assigned to them by the last Administration, a further sum of near seven millions of dollars might have been applied to the extinguishment of the public debt; and, instead of sixteen millions, twenty-three millions of it might have been discharged, since the present Administration came into office. Considering "the deep solicitude" which the President himself informs us, "is felt by every class of our citizens for the total discharge of the public debt," and the earnest desires professed by himself upon the subject, it was justly to have been expected that he would use all his influence and all his vigilance to hasten a "consummation so devoutly to be wished."

Now, sir, with such facts as these before our eyes, is it very surprising that some of us should entertain and venture to express the opinion, that, whatever other merits the present Administration may possess, an exemplary frugality is not one of them? There are many persons in this country who have not regarded the last Administration as a model of public economy. If they were obnoxious to the charge of extravagance, what must be said of the present Administration? And yet the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, in his pathetic summary of the wrongs and persecutions of the present Administration, specially complained of the charge of extravagance. He seemed to think it a very hard case that those, whom he considered such good stewards of the public resources, should be regarded by others as rather deficient in some of the attributes of that character. He complained, too, that the members of the cabinet, whom he eulogised for their distinguished talents, their wisdom, their virtues, their public services, had been viewed and spoken of with less admiration by others; and set all this down to the account of a persecuting spirit.

Retrenchment.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, I do not know a more legitimate subject for difference of opinion, than the talents and merits of public men. I will not say what I may think of the talents of the present cabinet, because I feel that, to give an opinion upon that point any weight, he who pronounces it must have some pretensions to talents himself. But, surely, those who are competent to judge, and who do not regard the abilities of the cabinet in the same favorable light that the gentleman from Massachusetts does, may be permitted to express their opinions without incurring the charge of persecution. What would the honorable gentleman do? Would he suppress all freedom of opinion? Will he refuse to make any allowance for inevitable differences of human judgment? No, sir; rather, I should hope, he would take the advice of Mr. Jefferson, and permit these deluded unfortunates to remain as "monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated, while reason is left free to combat it."

The recurrence of this venerable name reminds me of a duty, which the introduction, I had almost said, the unhallowed introduction of it, by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, imposes upon me. Sir, that gentleman, while descending on the subject of the billiard table, brought in the name of Mr. Jefferson as authority for this courtly pastime, and stated he had been informed that Mr. Jefferson had proposed to introduce it at the University of Virginia, as a fit amusement for the students. If it had not been for this allusion, I certainly should have forbore to say any thing upon a theme already sufficiently hackneyed. But, standing in the relation in which I did to that illustrious man as his neighbor, his too much honored friend, and protégé—standing, too, in the relation in which I do to that Institution, which was the pride and bantling of his old age, I feel that I ought not to permit the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts to pass without correction.

Sir, Mr. Jefferson was averse to all games of fashionable dissipation. I believe he never played at them himself. I am sure he always discouraged them in others. His principle, in regard to amusements—for he was a philosopher even in his amusements—was to make them, while they exercised the body and recreated the mind, subservient to some useful end; to the discharge of some practical duty. Hence his own favorite amusements were found in the superintendence of his farm, and in the cultivation of his garden; and, when the weather was such as to prevent him from taking his usual exercises without doors, (in which case some gentlemen have said that the billiard table might be a very proper amusement, even for "most potent, grave, and reverend seigniors" of state,) his habit was to occupy himself with the labors of the work-shop.

As every thing, however minute, which relates to the personal habits of a man like Mr. Jefferson, is interesting, I shall not be deemed tedious, I am sure, in mentioning the fact, known to you, Mr. Speaker, and others, as well as myself, that, in a room, adjoining his bed chamber, he kept a work bench, and a set of carpenter's tools, with which he employed himself, whenever the weather confined him to the house, in fabricating articles of domestic accommodation; and that many specimens of this kind now remain in his family, to attest his ingenuity, his industry, and the primitive simplicity of his habits. Whether the sage of Monticello at his work bench, or the President of the United States at the billiard table, would present the best moral lesson, the spectacle of truest sublimity, it is not for me to say.

Sir, the same views which directed Mr. Jefferson in his own amusements, governed him in recommending amusements to others. He never lost sight of the great principle of utility. In regard to a scheme of amusements for the University, I know he proposed the annexation of an experimental farm to it, that the students, in taking the exercise necessary for their healths, should become acquainted with the offices of rural labor; he proposed, also, the establishment of a workshop, that they might become familiar with the processes of mechanical skill; and, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will pardon me for mentioning the fact, he even recommended the exercises of the Campus Martius. Yes, sir, in the spirit of our Virginia Bill of Rights, which declares that "a well regulated militia, composed of the whole body of our People, trained to arms, is the proper defence of every free State," and recognising the paramount obligation of every citizen to devote his person and life to the defence of his country, he proposed to introduce the performance of military exercises, as a part of the amusements of the University, that the accomplishments of the soldier might be superadded to the attainments of the scholar, and this he did without the slightest apprehension of fostering a military spirit, or producing a race of "Military Chieftains," who were to be the future destroyers of the liberties of their country.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, from what has been said by the friends of the Administration, in the course of this discussion, that they expected, by the fascinations of their eloquence, to cheat us of the evidence of our senses. They have exhibited such delightful pictures of the peace and happiness of the country, and of the wisdom and beneficence of our rulers, that one would think we were in the midst of a political millenium; and when notes of discontent break upon the ear, we turn, with astonishment, to see from what hidden and malignant source the unwelcome sound proceeds, least of all supposing that it can be the voice of the people. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SENECAUS] consummated the climax of poetry and praise, by telling us, that, in after ages, the patriots of the land will look back to these times with mixed admiration and regret, as the pure and happy days of the Republic!

Upon what principle the gentleman from Pennsylvania can represent those as the pure and happy days of a Republic, in which, for the first time, the great body of the People have become divided from the Government, I am utterly at a loss to conceive. When, before, has it happened, that the People of this country, during the existence of an Administration, have returned to both Houses of Congress a majority opposed to that Administration? Even the elder Mr. Adams, odious as his Administration had become, retained a majority in both branches of the Legislature to the very last. Is this unprecedented popular discontent, then, without any cause?

Sir, I had been taught to believe, that the contentment and satisfaction of the People were the best evidence of a wise and faithful administration of the Government. Permit me to read what one of the ablest and most sagacious writers that ever employed his pen in the public cause, (Junius) has said upon this subject: "If," says he, "we see the People obedient to the laws, prosperous in their industry, united at home, and respected abroad, we may reasonably presume that their affairs are conducted by men of experience, abilities, and virtue. If, on the contrary, we see an universal spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction, a rapid decay of trade, dissensions in all parts of the empire, and a total loss of respect in the eyes of foreign Powers, we may pronounce, without hesitation, that the Government of that country is weak, distracted, and corrupt. The People, in all countries, are patient to a certain point. Ill usage may rouse their indignation, and hurry them into excesses; but the original fault is in Government."

Now, let us apply this test to the present Administration. Are the People prosperous in their industry? Let the depressed condition of agriculture and commerce, throughout the country, and the loud complaints even of the favorite child of the Government, manufactures, give the answer. Are we united at home? The notorious discontents of the public mind, and the agitations and contentions of this hall, furnish melancholy proof to the contrary. Are we respected abroad? Let the present state of our relations, both with Europe and America, the absolute refusal of the most powerful Government of the Old World to negotiate with us on a subject of mutual interest, and the jealous evasion of our friendly advances by the Confederate Governments of the new, with the insults and outrages of one of them, (Brazil) yet unatoned for, inform us.

If we then turn to the reverse of the picture, do we not find every trait of it almost literally fulfilled in our present condition? Is there not an universal spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction, a rapid decay of trade, dissensions in all parts of the empire, and an almost total loss of respect in the eyes of foreign Powers? As to the causes of this decay of trade, and the loss of respect in the eyes of foreign Powers, I will only say that, in my opinion, they are justly chargeable to the errors or blunders of the present Administration. As these subjects, however, have been much discussed elsewhere, and are necessarily involved in a great deal of detail, I will not take up the time of the House, at this moment, with a development of my views in relation to them.

But it may be instructive to inquire, whence has arisen the universal spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction, whence those dissensions in all parts of the empire, which are admitted to prevail? It is, Sir, because the People believe that, in the last election of their Chief Magistrate, the vital principle of their sovereignty was assailed. In that election, they saw the great principle of representative responsibility openly violated and disregarded; and that violation forthwith patronized and rewarded by the Chief Magistrate, with the first place in his cabinet, and subsequently, by bestowing favors upon all who, in contributing to his elevation, had forfeited the confidence, and lost the support of their constituents. The People, moreover, believe that, in the circumstances of that election, and the cabinet arrangements which succeeded it, taken in connexion with a certain doctrine of "safe precedents," then for the first time avowed, they see, if not an express design, an inherent and inevitable tendency in the thing itself, to supersede all agency of the public will, in the choice of the Chief Executive Magistrate, and virtually to transfer to the incumbent the right of nominating his successor.

These, Sir, are some of the causes of that spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction which now universally prevail. But they are not all. The present Chief Magistrate is hardly warm in his place before he proclaims, from the seat of authority, doctrines in relation to the powers of this Government, incompatible with every notion of a limited Constitution, and which threaten the rights of the States, and the liberties of the People, with total extirpation; and after having thus, by a lawless construction, indefinitely extended the powers of the Government, of which he forms a part, he seeks to appropriate to himself the largest share of the spoil, by new and unprecedented claims of Executive prerogative. In the true spirit of arrogated power, we then see him, in a time of profound peace, and when there was every reason to expect a speedy extinction of all grounds of controversy, heedlessly threatening a sovereign member of the Union with the military force of the nation, of which he is, theoretically at least, the Commander in Chief. Here, sir, we see another source of those dissensions—of that spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction which now pervade the land.

But, Sir, the People have had still other causes of dissatisfaction. They have seen the expenditures of the Government rapidly increased, at the same time that the revenue has been declining, till the fact has occurred, which the President himself, however disposed to palliate, is compelled to admit, that the expenditures of the last year have exceeded its income by nine hundred thousand dollars. This the President calls a "small excess"—which may give some idea of the scale by which he graduates his notions of public economy. Sir, the People would not complain of this excess of expenditure, if they thought it had been bestowed on great national objects, connected with the safety or the glory of the country. But they believe that much of it has been bestowed, without any adequate consideration of public service, in extravagant allowances to favorites, and rewards to partisans, in extending the influence to the Executive through new and costly modes of patronage, and with a view to secure the continuance in office of the present incumbents.

Sir, these are some of the causes of that spirit of distrust and dissatisfaction which now universally prevail, and they show, according to the sagacious remark of the writer whom I have quoted, that the original fault is in Government. As long as these causes of distrust and dissatisfaction shall exist, I cannot agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that these are the pure and happy days of the Republic! Sir, the day may come when the present period shall be looked back to as a proud and splendid era—proud and splendid for having witnessed a successful triumph over the will of the People, and the principles of the Constitution. But when that day arrives, this Government will be a Republic no longer.

Sir, I am sorry to have been under the necessity of making these remarks. But they have been extorted from me by the course of the friends of the Administration in this debate. Their extravagant eulogies of the Administration—their seductive representations of the present happy condition of the country, in regard to the enjoyment of political blessings, and the security of political rights, are so many accusations against the People for causeless discontent—for ingratitude—for injustice! As a Representative of the People, I have felt myself called upon to defend them against these accusations, and to show that their discontents have originated in something more than a querulous spirit of capricious disloyalty.

Mr. BARTLETT obtained the floor, and, after saying a few words, moved that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CLARK, of New York demanded the Yeas and Nays on this question; and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. BARTLETT said, that, as some gentlemen appeared averse to adjourning, he would withdraw his motion. He then proceeded, and observed, that his principal object in rising, was to propose an amendment, or, rather, to suggest one, which he intended to offer so soon as it should be in order to do so. Mr. B. then stated the amendment to which he referred, and was proceeding in his remarks, when

Mr. BURGESS moved an adjournment.

On this question Mr. HAILE demanded the Yeas and Nays, and they were ordered by the House, and being taken, the motion to adjourn was lost, Yeas 53, Nays 117.

Mr. BARTLETT then resumed, and said, that, as gentlemen whom he had himself heard with great pleasure, seemed to show an unwillingness to listen to the remarks of others, he should withdraw his intention of detaining the House one moment longer from taking the question.

The cries for the question were now loud in every part of the House, and the CHAIR having put the question on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON to the amendment of Mr. BLAKE,

Mr. DORSEY demanded that the question be taken by Yeas and Nays; and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. WHIPPLE said he did not intend to occupy the attention of the House for any length of time, nor to procrastinate, by extended debate, the business of the nation, which would be better done, by reasonable dispatch, than by promises to do it early and go home, whilst we were, at the same time, by protracted discussions, disappointing the reasonable expectations which we thus excite among the People. In the early part of this discussion, he had said to the House, that he was entirely willing to go into a full investigation of the expenditures in the several departments of the Government, and wished the investigation to be of the most full and fair kind, which might, at the same time, result in the correction of any abuses which might be found to exist, and also give the several officers of the Government an opportunity to be fully heard and fairly represented. No member delegated to this House could object to this course. It was our duty to grant supplies, and to know how those supplies had been expended, whether according to law, or not; but, at the same time, we ought to guard against the introduction of the characters of those entrusted with the execution of the laws.

The amendment now introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DORSEY] proposed to make the inquiry retrospective, so as to ascertain whether the contingent expenditures had increased or diminished during the present Administration, when compared with those of former ones. To this course he saw not only no unfairness, but much propriety and justice: for, should the investigation show, that more economy had been used by the present, than by former Administrations, it could not be the intention of even their adversaries to deny them the merit of having effected it; if so, he did not envy them their feelings. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] to whom he always listened with attention, and with pleasure, had said, as had also another gentleman from the same State, [Mr. RANDOLPH] who, on account of his long experience in matters of Government, was entitled to some consideration, that the expenses of the Government had increased, were increasing, and ought to be diminished. If the expenses of Government have, within the period of the present Administration—increased in an undue proportion to the increase of population in the country—the increase of our various plans of improvement, which have been put into execution—then we might, indeed, be called on to retrench, with great force and propriety.

We should recollect, sir, that our necessary relations with other nations have increased. A new family of nations has sprung up to the South of us, who are certainly entitled to our respectful attentions, to say the least of it, and this must cause us some increase of expenditure. Our Navy was formerly small—we had but a very inferior marine, which is now grown quite respectable—the contingencies must therefore have been necessarily increased in this Department. Our intercourse with the Indians had also been extended, new purchases have been made, treaties concluded, in which some of the States felt a very deep interest, removals effected and effecting, of whole tribes. Such operations of the Government could not be carried on without an increase of expense: the appropriations were made by this House, were authorized by law, and were not, therefore, to be charged to the prodigality of the Administration. Mr. W. said he would not consume the time of the House, by enumerating the great increase in the extent, utility, and importance, of all our national institutions. He would, however, notice the land system, which had been much extended since its institution, had yielded yearly to the Treasury moneys to the amount of more than a million of dollars, and had also drawn from the Treasury as much, and more, than it had yielded to it, by about two millions and a half of dollars; yet the value of the land system to the People of this nation, widely extended as they were, was not to be estimated by a close account of dollars and cents, but by the extensive benefits which have been conferred upon the rapidly increasing population of this nation. It was not giving to the People just notions of the operations of our Government, to say that no increase of expense was justifiable. It would be as rational to tell the farmer that he should continue his limited accommodations, in the same style, after he had grown wealthy, and make no improvements in his mode of culture, because he might incur an increase of expense. Economy is relative, and consists in the adjustment of means to ends—disbursements to receipts. If the expenditures of the Government have only increased in a just proportion to the increased means of the country, and have been expended for the ends to which they were by law destined, then the Administration is blameless. Yes, sir, if we have disproportioned our appropriations to the wants of the country, or the means of the Treasury, it is not the fault of the Administration. If extravagance has been introduced into this Government, let us know under whose Administration it commenced—let us give those who now administer the Government an opportunity to be compared with their predecessors, and, if entitled to approbation, let them receive it. If this amendment shall be adopted, Mr. W. said, his vote would be given for the resolution as amended; if not, at the proper stage of the proceeding, he should move to amend the original resolutions, so that the expenditures in the Departments might be brought under examination from a period commencing earlier than the year 1824.

Mr. STRONG inquired, whether, should the amendment be adopted, it would be in order to amend it.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. STRONG then said, that he would vote for the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, if that part of it which designated the committee to which it should be referred, were left in blank. As the amendment now stood, he must vote against it, because he did not wish this inquiry to go to a Select Committee, but to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TAYLOR reminded his colleague that Mr. BLAKE's amendment referred the inquiry to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STRONG replied, he was aware of this, but he preferred Mr. HAMILTON's amendment to that of Mr. BLAKE, in every other respect but this. If the gentleman from South Carolina would put this in blank, he would vote for his amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON not signifying assent, the question was put on the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON to the amendment of Mr. BLAKE, and adopted, by Yeas and Nays, 112 to 74.

Mr. CHILTON said he had risen to express his satisfaction with the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, and, good natured as it might seem in the eyes of some gentlemen upon that floor, to signify his acceptance of that amendment as a modification of his resolution.

The CHAIR reminded Mr. CHILTON that this could not be done.

The original resolution was now read, as amended, when

Mr. DORSEY moved to amend Mr. HAMILTON's amendment, by inserting, after the words "secret service money," the words, "from the 1st July, 1790."

Mr. DORSEY said, that his only objection to the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON was, that it confined the inquiry with regard to the secret service money, to the present Administration; whereas it ought to go back to the beginning of the Government, that a comparative estimate might be made of the amount of this fund under the different Administrations of the Government. Justice demanded that the committee should be instructed to what point they were to extend their inquiry.

H. of R.]

Retrenchment.

[Feb. 5, 1828.]

Mr. HAMILTON replied that he had stated, in his amendment, no particular time, because he did not wish to embarrass the committee. He had purposely left this open, that the committee might accumulate all the information they could, consistently with rendering their report at the present session. If the House should order them to prosecute their inquiry to a particular given point of time, and it should turn out that they were not able to reach that point in time to report during the present session, what could the committee do? Must they make a partial report—an incomplete one? Then they would be subject to blame for not having performed all their duty.

Mr. DORSEY said, that, if the amendment he proposed embraced a general and extensive range of inquiries, the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina might apply. But his amendment only asked that the committee should inquire into the different amounts of one particular fund, under the successive Administrations, from the year 1790. Could this present such a very great difficulty? He appealed to the gentleman's candor for a reply.

Mr. HAMILTON answered, that if, in all the expenditures, the law had been fulfilled, it could be no matter where the inquiry should stop. But if the law had been violated, the gentleman from Maryland must himself acknowledge, that precedent would not justify its violation.

Mr. BURGESS said, it appeared to him very singular that, when the House was inquiring as to the amount of a fund, the expenditure of which was placed, by law, under the sound discretion of the President of the United States, gentlemen should object to turning back their eyes to the history of the preceding Administrations. He readily agreed that one violation of law could never justify another. But the inquiry related to a matter where there was no law—where the law had expressly refused to interfere, and had itself committed the expenditure of the fund to the discretion of the Executive. He, for one, wanted to see if the Executive was not as discreet now, with relation to this expenditure, as it had been in former days. The gentleman from South Carolina was apprehensive that there would not be time for this inquiry. But, the fund was disbursed in two parcels only, and there were now, perhaps, twenty accounts to be looked at. He would venture to say that there was not a gentleman in the House who could not make the whole examination in three days. All that was asked for was merely a few copies from the Treasury books: for he had not understood that this committee were to have power to send for persons and papers. They were not to sit as a body inquisitorial, and bring before them every President now alive. The President, when he had expended this sum, gave his certificate that he had done so. This was all the law required, and were this committee to put three Presidents of the United States under interrogatories, and demand of them why did you pay this item? and why did you pay that? He hardly believed it was the intention of the House, that the Committee should do that; and unless they went into such an inquiry, all that they wanted was already on paper, and could readily be obtained. He wished to know why gentlemen had gone into an inquiry of this invidious character? But if they must inquire about this discretionary fund, was it not proper, would it not be becoming and dignified, to compare the prudence and good judgment of one President, with that of another? Could gentlemen, by refusing this, wish to give to their inquiry the character of a mere electioneering project? Could it be their object to fix suspicion on the present President of the United States? If not, why must the Committee be forbidden to travel beyond the limits of the present or the past Administration? Let them go back to the beginning, and then let the People judge how prudent the present Administration has been, when compared with those which have preceded it.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said that he did not rise to discuss the general question, but to make a suggestion to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMILTON.] That gentleman had specified no time whatever, within which the committee were to make this inquiry; and, as a reason for this omission, had expressed his fear, that, if any point were designated, the committee might not have time to reach it. But, if no point was specified, peradventure, the committee might begin at the other end, and so we may have the detail of half a dozen years, but not coming down far enough to touch the question. I, for one, said Mr. B. wish the House to probe this matter to the core. Let us do every thing that comports with justice and truth; let us inquire minutely and thoroughly; and then we shall be prepared to say whether we will acquit or condemn. According to the view of the gentleman from South Carolina himself, the committee might possibly not be able to do all that could be wished; but, if you leave them to begin wherever they please, they may shed all their light upon one spot, and that would "only make darkness visible."

Mr. M'DUFFIE said he had risen to suggest to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DORSEY] a modification of his motion, which he thought would more effectually accomplish the object he had in view. He said Mr. M'D. this inquiry is to assume the aspect of being intended to implicate the Administration, I, for one, should be very sorry to withhold from them whatever fairness and justice may require. I am in favor of giving the inquiry sufficient latitude to let a comparison be drawn, and yet, not enough to smother the inquiry altogether. If the gentleman would extend it back, so as to include the Administration of Mr. Monroe, he would vote for it. But he thought there was no propriety in including in the comparison the Administration of Mr. Madison, during a part of which, the country had been at war, and when there was a particular use for this fund. The comparison, in order to be fair, ought to be between Administrations analogously situated.

Mr. TAYLOR said that it would not require three hours' labor of a clerk to give all the results sought for by the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. The time to be consumed, therefore, could form no objection. As to the different situation of an Administration when the country was at war, and in peace, there was sufficient intelligence in the American People to make the necessary allowances on this score. The information now sought had never yet been communicated in any report that he knew of.

Mr. T. concluded by demanding that the question on Mr. DORSEY's amendment should be taken by yeas and nays, and it was so ordered by the House. The question being now about to be put—

Mr. INGHAM said, that, as the yeas and nays had been ordered, he wished to give the reasons which would govern his vote. He thought it important that the House should establish the principle that it might at any time look into the conduct of the Administration of the Government, without being always compelled to go back to its origin. Suppose the Government was a thousand years old, and a future Administration should be charged with abuse, must our posterity be obliged to go back to the beginning of the Government, to see something to sanction it? There could be no reason for going back with this inquiry, unless it was to seek for some abuse. Sir, said Mr. I. we have been invited to this inquiry—we have been challenged, dared, taunted, and pressed to the inquiry. But now, when the resolution to inquire is passed, the scene changes, and the gentlemen who challenged us are not willing to go into the inquiry, unless they can find some mantle from the past with which to cover the nakedness of this Administration. Sir, is this the tone which they have held for the last week or so? They told us to probe this matter to the bottom; to conceal nothing; to publish our discoveries to the world. But what are we told now? You must not inquire into the expenditure of the secret service fund, unless you go back and get something to cover the conduct of the Administration. Sir, I have no objections to the amendment, but they surely are the last gentlemen who ought to have made such a proposition. Their bold and manly tone is strangely changed, when we touch the contingent fund. Then we behold a fluttering—yes, sir, strange, unaccountable fluttering. We must be sent back to the days of Washington. But what has such an inquiry to do with this Administration? Were we not invited? Were we not pressed? Were we not urged to this inquiry? Why do gentlemen now back out, and change their ground?

Mr. BARTLETT said, when he had last taken his seat, he was happy in believing that the question was at last about to be put. But, sir, what do we witness now? Instead of taking the question, the discussion is protracted by those who have had the House to themselves for the last two days. Now, the gentleman says, we back out—we change our ground. Sir, since such language is held, I will no longer observe the courtesy I had intended, of withdrawing the remarks I had contemplated. Sir, what is the proposition before you? Is it to shrink from investigation? I do not understand the gentleman's language, if this is shrinking. Is it shrinking from inquiry to extend inquiry? In order to judge, we must have the means of comparison. The amendment will give us those means. Sir, the observations of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, have been of such a character as induces me, reluctant as I might be, at this late hour, to intrude myself upon the House, to recur to the remarks which it had been my intention to submit.

Mr. B. having proceeded thus far, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1828.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution for retrenchment, as amended on the motion of Mr. HAMILTON; when

Mr. BARTLETT said, that, in the early stage of the debate, he had attempted to address the Chair, not for the purpose of engaging in the discussion, but to invoke the House to abstain from it. An appeal, the sentiments of which he most cordially approved, had been made—he was sorry to say, in vain had been made—by gentlemen from South Carolina, Tennessee, and Louisiana, [Messrs. McDUFFIE, BELL, and LIVINGSTON.] Since the debate had assumed a character somewhat different from that with which it commenced, I have [said Mr. B.] given some attention to the statements made by gentlemen in their arguments to this House. After the able and imposing speeches of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Virginia, [Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. RIVES] to whom the House listened so attentively, through the last two days, I was disposed, should the discussion be continued, to submit some observations in reply. To ascertain the feeling of the House, the motion to adjourn was made, which, on seeing a disposition manifested to take the question, I most cheerfully withdrew. Untenable as I believed the positions attempted to be sustained by those gentlemen, I chose to forego any reply I might make, rather than contribute, by possibility, to the extension of the discussion to another day. When the motion to adjourn was renewed by another gentleman, I voted against it, upon the conviction that I could, in no way, do so acceptable a service, as to bring to an end, a debate, of which we, as well as the whole country, are sick and tired. I yielded the floor for the sake of the question, and the question only. After much further debate, however, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGHAM] rose, and with much ardor of manner, charged the friends of the Administration of having urged them on to investigation, taunted, provoked them to it, and of then “backing out” from the inquiry. This charge I could only understand in reference to the fact, that I had withdrawn myself from the debate. I could no longer, by my silence, assent to an imputation so unjust.

[Mr. INGHAM rose to explain—and said, in his remark, he did not allude to Mr. B's having refrained from speaking—it was not intended to apply to him.]

Mr. B. proceeded. I may have been led to make such application, from not seeing any other cause for the remark. There surely was nothing of backing out in the amendment then before the House, which proposed a more extensive and thorough inquiry, and even comparison with a former Administration. But for this, I should not have felt compelled to intrude myself upon the attention of the House—should not, as I now do, suffer, both on my own account, and that of the House, most painful regrets for such necessity. However reluctantly I come to this duty, it shall not be mingled with any thing of a personal character, or of unkindness of feeling.

So long have we been listening to the topics of this debate, and so wide a range has been taken, that its origin is already disputed. The resolution itself has been subjected to so many mutations, that its identity may well be questioned: it now retains scarce a single feature originally given it by its putative father. Of the original resolution, it should be remembered, that it affirmed as fact, that abuses existed; reform was necessary, and could be effected only by certain process, &c.; that these positions were sustained by the friends of the mover, with other allegations and specifications of charges of maladministration of the Government. We have been told, sir, that the President has been guilty of illegally pocketing public money, before his election to office; that he has come to the office by corruption, and a violation of the Constitution. He has been compared to the midnight robber in our dwelling house; has been charged with abuse of his official power, and prostrating the interest of the country. And yet we are asked, why so sensitive? Why do gentlemen suppose the Administration is attacked? They do, indeed, cast around them firebrands, and arrows, and death, and say, are we not in sport? Sir, when we look back upon this discussion, on the one hand we have heard charges alleged, insinuations and imputations attempted to be fixed upon the President of the United States; while, on the other hand, no retaliation has been resorted to—no syllable has been uttered against him for whose supposed benefit such resort to accusation is had. Let not the friends of that individual mistake the cause of this abstinence from recrimination and attack. Are there no facts to sustain such a course? And if none, could we not find a justification in the example of our opponents, to call the whippers of calumny, newspaper reports, or even the fictions of fancy, to the reinforcements of such warfare? But I will not be provoked to a course, in my judgment, so unbecoming my character and that of my country.

This subject has been treated as one of individual concern—as intended only to accuse, or excuse, the President and Executive of the United States. I come to it for higher purposes. I am for such resolution as shall secure the most thorough, uncompromising investigation—the most unsparing reform; and I say, what it would give me pleasure to say were I friendly or adverse, that, in my belief, a rigid scrutiny will furnish them a most triumphant vindication of every charge upon their official conduct. I thank God that, in my bosom, the heat of party has not yet consumed that better, higher regard for my country. Personal partialities and prejudices are the lot of humanity; but I cannot forget that, here, I am to act for the whole People. I come to my duties here under the influence of considerations connected with the place in which we stand—the age in which we live; its boasted progress of mind and improvement—the memory of the past—the course and character of those sages to whom we owe our institutions—the contemplation of the future—the judgment that shall be pronounced upon us, or the consequence we may bring upon posterity: for, unimportant as we individually may be, we are the trustees of the interests of future generations.

H. or R.]

Retrenchment.

There is a magic in the word retrenchment—economy. But what is the wealth of this nation? Is it the amount of shillings and pence in your Treasury? The extent of your domain? What has turned the eyes of the world upon this country? What has made the American name the proudest title of distinction in the civilized world? It is the character of our country. Was this bought with gold? And when degraded, debased, destroyed, can gold restore it? It is a treasure acquired by the services and sacrifices of patriots and sages, and sufferings and blood of martyrs. The character of our eminent men, in or out of office, is the property of our country; in which, sir, you and I, and all of us, have an interest. The Genius of America, when called upon for her treasures, points to her distinguished sons, and exclaims, "These, these are my jewels." And yet, sir, in this discussion, what have we been doing? Have we not been struggling to pluck from the diadem of our country's glory, and deface and tread into the dirt, those gems, which ages to come may not restore? Have we not been saying to the world that those individuals, whose patriotism, and talents, and public services, have been our pride and boast, are unprincipled traitors? Have we not said to the patriots in distant nations, struggling against oppression, and encouraging the friends of liberty, Look no longer to us for example—patriotism is but a name—public service is proof only of selfishness—and our institutions, in the newness of spring, are already rotten to the very foundations? What would be our judgment upon him who should wantonly demolish this splendid edifice? And yet it might be restored. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLEET] has said, the Government may have foreign hirelings, English or German, employed to utter calumnies against our great and good men. The Government will never do it, and I pray Heaven that such employment may not be thought a fit service in which to earn our per diem. Let us not cast the firebrand of destruction here into the temple of our liberties, to acquire the infamous immortality of its incendiaries.

It is not from investigation that I would seek to protect any one, but from that indiscriminate denunciation which is uttered without proof; that sentence which precedes inquiry. In the contest now before the country—who shall be elected to preside over it—let us not set the example of degrading it, till such office shall no longer be worth the ambition of an honest man. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has appealed to the House upon the enormity of sentiment which he imputes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SEBASTIAN] who preceded him, "that inquiry would injure the Government." I beg leave to say, I heard no such sentiment advanced by that gentleman, and therefore his comment was uncalled for. The gentleman did say, he should not have proposed the resolution, from an opinion that it was not needed, and could, therefore, produce no good; and unavailing and unnecessary movements of this sort, were of evil tendency; but, since it was moved, he should vote for its adoption. He advanced no doctrine of secrecy and mystery, against which the gentleman spoke with so much earnestness. By gentlemen on the other side have the objections been urged against pursuing this measure, now before us, to some result.

It is, say they, not the proper time. If abuses exist, the first moment of their discovery is the true time to set about their reform. But we are told the President and Heads of Departments might not choose that we should make inquiry. That they "hold the keys"—"stand at the gate of the fortress." And have we not indeed the power? Have this House recently asserted the power of sending and bringing citizens from their business, and families, at the extremes of the Union? Have they asserted the right to open their desks—their private books, and to lay them before the world; and have we not power to enter and examine our own offices—the departments of our own creation? If this House and the Executive differ in opinion on other subjects, it may ensure an investigation, that will in no point be remitted for favoritism. What are the People to be told, by such a resolution, and a refusal to pursue it? That cause for alarm exists; but that other means than the discharge of our duties here must be resorted to for a remedy. In relation to the Executive, I believe such alarm most groundless; but that, whatever evil may exist, we have ample power to correct it. I will not deny that abuses exist in relation to this House, to which I shall presently briefly advert, and which we may remedy.

Public opinion has been prepared for the charges now alleged against the present Executive, by imputations of aristocratic feelings and habits to the President, while his purely republican, unostentatious manners are proverbial, even to a degree to excite an ironical remark from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMILTON] for his want of those airs and graces, which he thinks did not secure for us the Treaty of Ghent. Forty years service for his country have shown other qualities, if not as ornamental, to be quite as useful.

After, it would seem, that the whole vocabulary of harsh epithets had been exhausted upon those who administer the Government, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMILTON] says, he will not have the "egregious folly" to bring charges against them. He will move nothing. The charges have been made, and the justice of the gentleman's character of them I will not controvert. But he has not at all times had the same fear of extra-legislative movements—in the resolution of the 8th of January, and that now upon our orders, relative to the Sedition Law.

Before advertising to the specific abuses alleged more directly against the President, I will bestow a passing notice upon the general view presented by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] who, although one of the number who voted to put this resolution to sleep, seems now to favor an inquiry.

There surely can be no disposition to controvert the truism stated by the gentleman—the general tendency of all things to decay. The energies of manhood are to be lost in the imbecility of age; matter is destined to dissolution; these marble columns around us, grasped by the hand of Time, will crumble into dust; and even the globe which we inhabit, perish. But are we then to say that the vigor of youth is itself the paralysis of dotage; that we already feel this edifice tottering to its fall; that we, even now, hear the trump of the angel who shall announce the dissolution of nature? But, says the gentleman, it is twenty-five or twenty-six years since there has been any reform in the organization of the Departments of Government. One most important provision in our Constitution should at no time be lost sight of, and it furnishes an answer to most of the charges of abuse by the Executive in the expenditure of the public treasure, and should quiet the fears of those who apprehend we may be plundered by the President or Heads of Departments. It is the 1st article, 10th section: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." Whatever, then, may be the organization of the Departments, or want of organization, the door is shut, and we hold the key of it. The gentleman, however, in his statement respecting the organization of the Departments, has not adverted to the history of our legislation upon that subject. I will notice only that of the Treasury. It was established by act of September 2, 1789. From that period, it has been under the constant revision of Congress, by acts passed upon the subject in 1791, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 1800, 6, 9, 13, 14, 17, 18, 20, 22, 24—twenty in number, the titles of some of which are, "For the organization of the Treasury Department," "For the better organization," &c. "To amend the acts," &c. By this legislation it appears, that in all early periods of the Government, appropriations of money were general, and the Executive applied it at discretion. Till 1809, whatever specifications were made, were of no effect, as transfers could be made from one fund to another; and in the recess of Congress the same could be done, up to the year 1817. At this period the specific purpose of each appropriation, and each part of every appropriation, is designated by law, and no other fund can be used, or that fund used for any other object. I name only these great reforms in principle, without going into the details of the improvements in the organization generally.

In answer to the interesting view of our financial prosperity, presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPOONER] who addressed the House on Saturday, the gentleman from Virginia has said, that this and former Administrations have not accounted for all the means which came into their hands—that five millions a year are accounted for—that if, in twelve years, they have paid seventy millions of the public debt, they had three hundred millions of revenue. Whence the gentleman obtains his three hundred millions does not appear. But suppose that the true sum, he surely can be at no loss to find, in the interest of the public debt, an occasion for an application of the real difference between the receipts and the payment of the expenses of Government, and reduction of the principal. But take the gentleman's own position, and how eminently above every other Administration does he elevate the present. He makes nine years of former Administrations pay but thirty-seven millions of debt, with an income of two hundred and twenty-eight millions of revenue; while the present, in three years, has paid thirty-three millions of principal and interest, with but seventy-two millions revenue, and has also expended twelve millions for permanent works of internal improvement. "It will," says the Secretary, (in his last annual report) "be satisfactory to Congress to know, that, during the three years in question, besides these payments made on account of the debt, and all other payments to meet the annual expenses of Government, large sums have been applied to objects wearing a character neither temporary or annual." This sum thus expended for permanent improvements, is stated to be twelve millions. The Secretary adds, "a nation that, after providing for the regular support of its Government, is seen to proceed in this manner in the payment of its public debt, and in additional disbursements so considerable, for which equivalents remain, that, for the most part, are of permanent value to the nation, cannot be regarded as other than prosperous in its financial condition."

That part of the gentleman's calculations which was intended to show that burdens borne by the People of this country are greater than have been estimated, does not pretend to connect with that result any censure of those who now administer the Government. But I am not willing that the People be induced to believe they are suffering evils from any causes that do not exist. If I understood the gentleman's purpose, it was to prove a great amount of tax to the Government, to be paid by the People; and with the liberty of assuming what premises we choose, any desirable result is easily obtained. He assumes, as the amount of revenue, twenty-five millions—the true receipts of the year being twenty-two millions. He adds five millions as the per centage of the merchant, of which I do not understand the process of converting into a Government tax. To this thirty millions, twenty millions are added for the taxes assessed for the support of Government by the States; while the fact is, that, if all the States assessed the same as Virginia and New-York, the whole sum would be but twelve millions. So far from this, many of the States raise no more than from forty to sixty thousand dollars annually for the support of Government, making a gross sum of about one million, instead of twenty millions. We should, of course, come to very different results; that gentleman assuming, as the amount paid, fifty millions of dollars, while we find no proof of a sum over twenty-three millions.

Another argument to support the charge of extravagant expenditure, is attempted to be founded upon a comparison of this and the Administration of Mr. Jefferson. I thank the gentleman for calling us to this comparison. It proves that the economical principles of Jefferson were not so successfully reduced to practice, even by himself, as they have been during the last three years. From three or four millions in Jefferson's Administration, says the gentleman, our expenditures have increased, in one fourth of a century, to twenty five millions.

[Mr. RIVES rose to explain. He said he considered three or four millions as the ordinary current expenses of Mr. Jefferson's Administration; and the ordinary current expenses of the present to be thirteen millions.

Mr. BARTLETT said he did not know how the gentleman made his thirteen millions.

Mr. RIVES said he would tell him. It was by taking the amount paid toward the debt from the whole amount of expenditures.]

Mr. BARTLETT. A much simpler process, and one which has the advantage of being accurate, is, to take the estimates of expenditures for the year, as appear by the Secretary's report, which, instead of thirteen millions, gives us the precise sum of $8,990,380 44.

In 1801, the expenditures of the Government were $12,624,646 36—the receipts of the same year were $12,846,530 95. In 1808, the expenditures of Government were $16,764,584 20—the receipts of the same year were $17,160,661 93. In the first of which years, the amount of what the gentleman terms the current expenses of Government, was a fraction less than five millions, and in the last a fraction over six millions five hundred thousand dollars, instead of the sum of three or four millions, by him supposed.

What was the condition of this country then, and what is it now? Can the habiliments of the cradle be fitted to the size and proportions of manhood? At that period referred to, this House consisted of one hundred and forty members—now, of two hundred and thirteen. The Senate then consisted of thirty-two members—now, of forty-eight. The expenses of these two branches was then 164,526 dollars—it is now 471,800 dollars. For an army, in 1802, we had 2,400 men, at a cost of 844,009 dollars; we have now 6,000 men, at a cost of 2,050,317 dollars. We had then, instead of a navy, six frigates, seven sloops of war, and some gun-boats—with nine captains, thirty-six lieutenants, and one hundred and fifty midshipmen, at a cost of 900,000 dollars—we now have seven ships of the line, eleven frigates, twelve sloops of war, besides schooners and smaller vessels—with thirty-three captains, two hundred and twenty-nine lieutenants, and three hundred and ninety-two midshipmen, at a cost of 3,286,649 dollars. What was then our territory, compared with the present, and what the condition of it?—The whole region northwest of the Ohio sent a single Delegate—who is now in the Senate, supported by eighteen Representatives, and five other Senators from the same Territory. The arm of our Government, on the South, has been extended to the Gulf of Mexico; on the West, we approach the Rocky Mountains; and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Florn] is already impatient to plant our standard at the mouth of the Oregon.

Since that period, our domain has every where been extended by extinguishment of Indian title. Our country has been carried triumphantly through war. Millions, in claims growing out of it, have been paid, while a million and a half in a year has been distributed to the remnant of the Patriot Army of the Revolution. The soldiers of the Army, with their increased pay, and present perfect organization, it will be found, cost us less per man, than at the time referred to, while the permanent fortresses upon our coasts and frontiers, give security to our towns and territory. Though in war, our gallant Navy commands respect, and secures favor—yet, in peace, we feel its expenses and forget its protection. It is too often spoken of as an expenditure for the seaboard, and for the merchant. True, it is the shield to our citizen and his property in the remotest sea, but this benefit is enjoyed equally by the farmer beyond the Alleghany as the citizen of the port whence the squadron sails. The protection given to our commerce is a reduction from the rate of insurance, always in effect paid by the grower of the product, or the consumer of the import—and during one period of our government, an expenditure of 2,800,000 dollars, in increasing the Navy, saved to the country 8,600,000 dollars in a single year, in the reduction of premiums of insurance upon our tonnage.

The expenses of foreign intercourse have been a theme of great complaint, and one upon which the gentleman had also instituted a comparison. I will not only attend to his comparison, but extend it back to the origin of the Government. Let us, however, take with us the fact, that we have now more missions upon the continent of South America, than we have upon the continent of Europe. By the reduction of the grade of the mission at Chili to a Chargé, Government has been enabled to send a Chargé to Denmark, where we have claims in controversy.

The gentleman stated, that the expense of foreign intercourse in the three last years of Mr. Monroe's Administration, amounted to 280,000 dollars and the same expense in the three first years of the present amount to 413,000 dollars; making the present exceed the former by 267,000 dollars. The fallacy or error of the statement, is in imputing to Mr. Adams one year of the expenses incurred and provided for before he came to the office. The appropriation for 1825, was made in February, and with which Mr. A. had no more to do than his successor, whoever he may be, now has with the appropriation of this year. The amount of appropriations for foreign intercourse, then, stands thus:

In 1823,	$82,000	In 1826	$187,506
1824,	189,500	1827,	81,000
1825,	213,000	1828,	40,000 Panama
			49,000
	$484,500		$457,500

Leaving the expense of the last three years, 27,000 dollars less than the three last appropriations of the preceding Administration.

But, let us look still further back, and first, to Washington's Administration. The foreign intercourse appropriations were then as follows:

In 1791,	$1,733 33	In the time of Mr. J. Adams.
1792,	78,766 67	In 1797,	$172,504 23
1793,	89,500 00	1798,	242,711 22
1794,	146,403 51	1799,	199,374 11
1795,	912 633 12	1800,	165,145 33
1796,	109,739 64

$1,338,734 37 $799,734 89

In Mr. Jefferson's time, these expenses were—
In 1801,	$139,851 73	In 1805,	$2,665,769 62
1802,	416,253 62	1806,	1,613,922 09
1803,	1,001,968 34	1807,	419,845 61
1804,	1,129,591 68	1808,	214,233 26

$7,591,435 89

Exclusive of expense of Barbary intercourse.

These tables are authentic, and show how very far from the fact may be the conjectures and assertions respecting the increasing extravagance and prodigality of the Government.

Again. That item of the expense of foreign intercourse, embraced under the title of contingent expenses, has been adverted to as a source of great abuse. Here, for answer, let us resort to official documents.

There was expended of this fund—

In 1823,	$30,584 37	In 1826,	$18,627 07
1824,	20,145 78	1827,	36,248 63
1825,	25,474 95	1828,	no approp'n asked.

$54,875 70

This, which is designated as the contingent fund till after the close of Mr. Jefferson's term, was not distinguished, but embraced in a general sum for Foreign Intercourse.

The amount of this fund expended in the five last years of Mr. Madison's administration, was $293,340 03, making an average of $58,668 a year.

The amount of this fund expended in the eight years of Mr. Monroe's administration, was $289,316 78, making an average of $36,164 59.

The amount of this fund expended in the two years past of Mr. Adams's administration while no appropriation is asked for the present year, was $54,875 70, making an average of $27,437 85, for the two years; a sum less, annually, than was expended by Mr. Madison, by $31,230 15; less, annually, than the sum expended by Mr. Monroe, by $8,726 74.

Another view of this subject presents results equally triumphant in favor of this Administration, as does every view founded upon facts, and not conjecture and supposition.

Take the appropriations of 1823, 4, and 5, including all Ministers, Chargés, Agents of Claims, Secretaries, contingent expenses, intercourse with Barbary Powers, and relief of sick and distressed seamen, and the sums are:

1824,	243,500 00	1827,	296,000
1825,	282,000 00	1828,	deducting un-

$548 500

Which is less, by $195,455 17, than the same items of the three preceding years. I prefer such facts to any comment, and I present such facts as seem to me to need no comment. The gentleman's remark upon our "financial millennium," has something more of justice in it than he supposed, when it was made: for, if there has been any period in our Government which could in truth be so designated, this is that period. And what is his answer and his comment! An extract from the letter of Junius to the Editor of the Public Advertiser, describing the distresses, real or imaginary, of England; an extract interesting as a specimen of fine writing—doubly interesting as exhibit.

ng, by contrast, our own happy condition. But, says the gentleman, we hear complaints—our manufacturers complain of depression. And does he propose to relieve them? And is it this Administration or its friends that refuse to listen to their intreaties? The question needs no answer. Again, we are asked, why are there majorities in both branches of the Legislature opposed to the present Government? So far from being the result of discontent in the great body of the People, it comes from a fact directly the reverse. They were content and happy, and in their repose have suffered disappointed political zealots to obtain the power of misrepresenting them, from their own confidence in the wisdom and justice of the measures of the Government, that required not their efforts to protect or support them. A confidence from which, when a change of measures is threatened them, the People will arouse from their slumbers, and, like Sampson, burst the bonds with which political aspirants attempt to bind them. But why should there be discontent in any quarter? I answer, in the words of one who has well observed human nature: "Among all ranks and degrees of men, in all ages and in all countries, may be seen the rapid footsteps of a dark spirit of envy, treading closely, every where, upon the march of greatness, endeavoring to sully what is beautiful, and to bring down what is elevated."

Again, we are told we have lost our respect abroad. And when was the hour that the American name was a higher title of distinction than it now is, with every civilized nation? When the period that the American flag was a safer protection, with civilized or savage, in every corner of the globe? Was it in those halcyon days of Mr. Jefferson, so often referred to, when he could not spread a yard of canvass outside our harbors that was not subject to insult from the smallest canoe that rides upon the water? I refer not to that period in any disrespect to the distinguished individual who presided over us. Our country then had not developed its resources—had not acquired its character.

The gentleman further says, that the British West India colonial trade has been lost by the diplomatic blunders of the Administration. But what are the facts? During the administration of Mr. Monroe, this subject was under negotiation. Our Government then insisted that they should, in this trade, enjoy the same privileges as the British Colonies of North America. That was the question at the close of his term. So soon as that point could with decency be surrendered by his successor, it was given up. Then the British Government insisted on regulating the business by reciprocal acts of legislation, which, instead of being secured by treaty, would have left our commerce to the caprice or interest of the Parliament of Great Britain, or even the less formal annihilation, by a Decree in Council. This announcement was accompanied with the additional suggestion, that, if we should legislate for such a purpose, they would not even hold out an encouragement that they would meet us in such compromise. Congress refused to act in that crisis, and left the President no alternative but to execute former existing laws. But, sir, subsequent negotiation with another Power has secured to us that trade upon a better foundation than any act of Parliament would give it. Sweden has a treaty with Great Britain, securing reciprocal advantages of trade with her West India Possessions; and by a treaty with Sweden, which appears in the papers of this morning, we have secured a trade on the most advantageous terms, to the Island of St. Bartholomews. This gives us the indirect trade to the British Islands. Our trade to those Islands has never been but in articles of necessity to them. They must still have them, and pay themselves for the indirectness of the trade, while their ships are excluded from the trade to this country, giving us both the outward and home freight.

I shall refrain from following the gentleman's comments upon the power of the President's patronage, as specified in the appointments to office, and the disbursements of the public money. It has before been stated, and, I believe, truly, that there is but one officer in the Government over which the President has the absolute power of appointment—the Librarian to Congress. And the payment of salaries to Judges of Courts, under the laws of Congress, or upon contracts taken by friends or foes, upon the lowest bids, cannot be very powerful engines of influence.

I will, as briefly as may be, bestow a passing notice upon some of those more direct charges alleged against the President himself—among the highest of which, one is, that, previous to his selection as Minister to a foreign Court, he had illegally pocketed $9,000 of the public money. This is the allegation in terms as made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] and in proof of which, he remarks, he must be allowed to offer the argument of a lawyer. I should not have so designated the argument. The facts out of which this charge has arisen are these: While Mr. Adams was Minister at St. Petersburg, in April, 1813, he received from Mr. Madison the appointment of Minister Extraordinary, to negotiate with Great Britain, under the proffered mediation of Russia, which resulted in the meeting at Ghent, and, at the same time, received $9,000 outfit for that purpose, by virtue of the law of the United States, of May 1st, 1810, which authorizes the President of the United States to allow to a Minister Plenipotentiary, in going from the United States to any foreign country, an outfit which shall in no case exceed one year's full salary, &c. The gentleman contends that this description of the person who may receive, is intended to confine the grant to those only who actually sail at the time, or travel from the United States. There might be something more of plausibility in this, if the outfit were given to defray such charge; but it is given for extra charges at the court where, and not at the place whence, the Minister goes; and, in legal contemplation, surely every Minister appointed by the United States is a Minister going from this country to the Foreign Court.

Congress, after the mission, made an appropriation of but $4,500, to supply in the fund the amount paid to Mr. Adams by the President's order, and the Comptroller charged Mr. Adams with $4,500 to be refunded. Upon this Mr. Adams wrote to Mr. Monroe, on the 23d August, 1814, of which letter I give the following extract:

"I should certainly prefer to sacrifice both the right and property, rather than it should be made the occasion of controversy between the Executive and the Legislature: neither is it my disposition to insist upon any thing in the form of compensation for public service, which the Legislature, on a full consideration of the circumstances, should think unreasonable. But, if the Legislature considered the necessary increase of my expenditures, by the extraordinary mission under the Russian mediation, sufficiently compensated by the allowance of half an outfit, they will certainly perceive that the new mission, which has brought upon me the extraordinary expense of a journey 2,000 miles distant from my residence in Russia, and the extraordinary charges incident to my situation here, without relieving me, to state the fact as it is and must be, from a dollar of my necessary expenses at St. Petersburg, has given me a fair claim to an outfit equal to either of my colleagues. I state the fact, with a perfect conviction of my ability to prove it, that the extraordinary expenses for which an outfit is allowed, taking the two extraordinary missions together, have necessarily and unavoidably fallen more heavily upon me than upon either of them. Besides the whole outfit allowed them, they are now receiving, as members of this mission, a salary the same as that allowed me, while I am subjected to all the same expenses that they are here, and am still burthened with those of a residence in Russia."

Mr. Adams did not return to the United States until 1817. In his letter to Mr. Monroe, of May 23, 1822, he observes—

"That, during eight years of absence from the United States, upon six joint or separate missions, I regularly transmitted to the Department of State my account, made up to the end of every quarter of the year, all by duplicates: That all these accounts were duly received at the Department, and that the account in which I charged for the outfit on the mediation mission, and gave credit as received from Captain Lloyd Jones, was made up to the 30th September, 1813, and forwarded immediately.

It is admitted that every precedent, in every similar case, justifies the construction which President Madison gave to the law in this case. The same was held not only theoretically, but practically, by that distinguished jurist, Mr. Pinckney, who actually received the same in his mission to Naples and St. Petersburg. On the 5th June, the Attorney General, Mr. Wirt, answers an inquiry of the President in the following terms.

"After a careful consideration of the case of Mr. Adams, which you have submitted for my opinion, I think him clearly entitled to the whole outfit which was allowed and paid to him by the President, out of the fund placed by law at his disposal for this purpose. I think Mr. Adams's view of the subject unanswerable. The question of outfit is given to the President exclusively, and without limit, save only he is not to exceed a whole year's salary. In the present case, he kept within this limit, and his decision was final and irrevocable. The refusal of Congress to sanction the allowance, is wholly immaterial to this question. Their sanction was not necessary to consummate either the power of the President, or the right of Mr. Adams. They were both perfect without it. They stood upon existing laws, acting on an existing fund, thereafter to be called into being by a vote of Congress. Had the latter been the case, my opinion would have been different. Were an allowance of outfit nothing more than an estimate prepared by the President, to be laid before Congress, with the view of leading to an appropriation out of which it was to be paid, then Congress would have the control of the subject, and their refusal to appropriate would over-rule the President. But the fund for foreign intercourse is, I understand, an annual fund, out of which the expenses of that intercourse are paid; and it was from this fund, thus placed at the disposal of the President, that the outfit allowed to Mr. Adams was drawn and paid; and, consequently, that no appropriation was necessary to give the President's decision effect. The allowance having been thus regularly made and paid, I consider the subject as placed beyond the reach of recall, either by the President or Congress. It would be extremely unjust and cruel were it otherwise. An allowance is regularly made to a foreign Minister, on the express ground of its being necessary to the additional expenses which he must encounter in his new mission. He accepts the mission, and encounters the expense on the faith of the allowance made and paid to him by the President; and when the business is all over, and the expenses have been incurred and paid, he is told that he must refund one half of the advance! I am persuaded that no court of justice would tolerate this, and I will barely suggest, in conclusion, that, if you think otherwise, it is practicable to make the experiment, by ordering a suit against Mr. Adams for the alleged balance in his hands, to which, I dare say, he would make no objection; but you will not understand me as advising this course: for I am thoroughly persuaded that the suit would fail."

And the following is from Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Adams:

"Mr. Irvine's appointment to Spain involved the same question. It was wished to reserve the point for more deliberate consideration than could be bestowed on it when the letter of March 15th was written to you. I have now the satisfaction to inform you that the subject has been maturely weighed, and that the result has been in favor of the outfit, on the principle that those restrictive terms, if applicable to Ministers already in Europe, are no further so, than to confine the allowance to them, within the same limit."

This, then, is a case of money paid for public services rendered, and expenses incurred, upon a construction of law by the proper officer appointed to execute it, sanctioned by every President of the United States, who had ever acted upon it, by the same allowance made to every other Minister under like circumstances, approved by a former distinguished Attorney General, and officially confirmed by the present eminent officer in the highest law department of the Government. I leave such authority to be balanced, if he shall so contend, by the opinion of the gentleman who so broadly made the accusation.

The next in chronologic order, is the charge, that the President was elected by corruption, and has come to his office by a violation of the Constitution. The repetition of this language has become almost mechanical; and, if any one repeats it, believing in its truth, he is not to be reasoned with upon evidence. If the proofs before the world do not convince him of the innocence of the parties accused, then would he not be convinced "though one were to arise from the dead." To whom has the nation been directed for the proof of the allegation? Who has been emphatically designated by the accuser as the witness? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] And what has he here said in his place to this House, and to the world? "Of the charge of corruption in the election, I will not speak, (said he)—if there was any, I know it not." Yes, "hear him!" "hear him?" well might we exclaim. The witness, called upon to prove the fact, says, "I know it not!" But what is substituted for proof? The allegation that suspicion exists—and that suspicion is worse than proof of guilt—yes, more dangerous to the community—more demanding our indignation, that they should be suspected, than that they should be guilty, and convicted of the crime! For what country—for what age—for what institutions, is such doctrine fitted? And has it come to this, that we hear it unblushingly advanced on this floor?

Let desperadoes aim at the life; aye, higher—at the character of those most pure and elevated in society; let them go to the work of prostration and destruction by most unfounded falsehoods; let the pretended proofs of guilt establish, beyond controversy, the innocence of the accused; and then let this doctrine of suspicion come in to consummate the deed of destruction, and bring upon the head of the offending the punishment due to wickedness and crime. And will the gentleman—who has so much reason to be proud of being a lawyer—will he carry this doctrine with him to the courts of law? Should, not suspicion merely, but color of proof, ex parte testimony, procure an indictment against an honest and an innocent man, should we hear him exclaim—let him be innocent, let him be honest, but execute him, for he has been suspected? Least, of all, should I have expected such a doctrine, in this case, from that gentleman.

[Mr. BUCHANAN rose, to disclaim having intended to advance such opinion.]

Some gentleman had urged it, and given his reason that, if guilt were clear and distinct, the moral sense of the community would prevent evil consequence; but suspicion might be more dangerous in leaving a bad precedent. I have, said Mr. B. perhaps imputed to the gentleman opinions expressed by others; but, whoever should have expressed them, I should have expected him to come forth, at once, to defend the President and Secretary of State, from the consequences of such suspicion, or charge of suspicion. What, and who was the cause, unintentionally, innocently, the cause, that such a suspicion ever existed? [Mr. B. here read a part of a letter, which stated a conversation, &c. with a distinguished member of Congress, in December, 1824. A part of another letter, stating who that member of Congress was; and was proceeding to read an extract from Mr. BUCHANAN's address to the public in reply to the same, when the Speaker suggested, that it would not be in order to refer to opinions or writings, out of the House, of the members of the House.]

Mr. B. observed, he was not desirous to do so. My only purpose, said he, was to show that a conversation, held on by that gentleman, of which the parties accused had no part and no knowledge, had been the origin of all the suspicion, and all the crimination upon this subject, and that he, of all others, is most called upon to shield them from an injury, of which he had most unintentionally been the occasion.

But the President is to be condemned for asking him, and the Secretary for consenting, to go from this House to an Executive office; "descending," as the gentleman terms it, from that Chair to the Department of State. Is the gentleman aware how desolating a condemnation he thus pronounces? Has he not, at least in later times, joined in the praises of Jefferson's purity and integrity, and shall we now revoke the eulogies over his grave with which the country is yet resounding? Was he, too, corrupt? Are they all corrupt—that roll of patriots and sages, who voted for him in this House, and who took appointment at his hands, immediately on his inauguration? Oh no! The names of Lincoln, Gallatin, Claiborne, and those who voted and were promoted with them, are answers to ten thousand speculations of suspicion. The record may be found in Pub. Doc. 9th vol. 1st session 19th Congress, No. 164. The reiteration of such charges, and the countenancing such suspicions, are more to be regretted for the injury they do our country, than the individuals accused. They go deep into the foundations of our institutions. When the excitement of party shall have passed, the most zealous persecutors will relent. If there be one now living, who joined in the clamor against Jefferson, and he too shared the common lot, he has already lived to do penance, and would, were it possible, now wash out the stain with tears of contrition.

I will not dwell upon the charge of misconduct of the President in the appointment of his cabinet. It cannot be intended to apply to that portion of it which he took at the hands of his predecessor. The Secretary of State, the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON] has been pleased to say, was a distinguished declaimer in this House. While the country yet remembers, with pleasure and pride, the power with which that distinguished statesman sustained here the interests and character of the nation, to such remark there need be no other reply than is furnished by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who says, he had long looked with hope for his elevation to the highest office in this country—I will add, the highest office in the world. The gentleman's epithets, applied to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, characterizing it as "the multiplication table set to music," may possess more of truth than even he had supposed. Should the recommendations of that distinguished officer be pursued by us, we may yet see his principles prove to be the multiplication table of the weak and resources of the country, set to the music of industry, happiness, and prosperity, of the People. I complain not that the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has thought fit, before this House, to style the head of the War Department, "the banling of Belona." The country do not now, for the first time, hear of that distinguished citizen. Distinguished in his native State; in the Senate of the United States; and in the present office—in promptness, accuracy, and talent, not less distinguished than his predecessor.

But again we are told, that the President has assumed powers over the Constitution, and holden a right to disregard the will of his constituents. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CASSON] says he will "convict him of ignorance, or of—" what his delicacy did not permit him to name. This term convict, is technical, and to what, and to whom it is to be applied, I presume not to assert. It is, perhaps, a stronger term than the gentleman intended to apply to his difference of construction of language. For proof, resort is had to an expression in the Message of the President, to which no other reply need be made, than that, in a recent able public paper—"the phrase has been torn from its context, and misinterpreted."—"If these had been the taunts and railings of anonymous newspaper-scribblers, they would have been deemed unworthy of public notice; but when such charges are seriously made and reiterated, by men holding high stations in the Government, and exercising some influence over public opinion, they cannot be too strongly condemned."

What is the practical illustration of his disregard of "the will of his constituents?" When a member of the Senate of the United States, and his judgment required him to approve the measures of Government, against the opinion of his constituents, he returned to their hands the power they had committed to him, that they might exercise it agreeably to their own views. If the same deference were now paid to "the will of constituents," where would be the present boasted majorities? They might perhaps be greater—possibly they might not.

In every specification of abuse of power, and of extravagant expenditure by the President, "the Panama Mission" has been rung through all its changes. And what is this, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGRAM] styles "a splendid pageant?" The Government of South America, struggling to free themselves from the chains of oppression, propose to consult together upon subjects connected with the mutual welfare and the cause of free principles, and free institutions generally—they respectfully solicit us to be present, to advise and aid with our experience and example. The President proposes to accept, and submits the question to his constitutional advisers, to appoint, or not, Ministers to attend. I never entertained high expectations of the results of that meeting, but one reason assigned by the President would have been sufficient to have induced me to vote for the appropriation. If it were to decline to act with them, I would have done it by sending a Minister for the purpose. In a commercial point of view, the importance of our presence there is sufficiently indicated by the zeal of other powers, unasked to intrude themselves, where we were invited. But, had the President refused, what would have been—what would not have been the clamor against him? The enemy of the Republics of the South; the friend of the Holy Alliance, would have been held up for the execration of this and future ages. The language of a distinguished politician of the day, would have been verified—"had you taken the other side, we would forever have prostrated you."

Another accusation against the Executive is, that of a disposition to continue the existing abuses in the Government. And of this character has been named the Military Academy. In a Government like ours, resting upon the diffusion of knowledge, I will not presume to defend the establishment of institutions for education. No! I will wait till the time comes, if here it ever shall come, when some great reformer, who would "new vamp the Commonwealth," shall, in the language of Jack Cade, bring the charge distinctly against our rulers, that they have

"traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm, by erecting a grammar school." Whether the distinguished patriot who founded it, or Congress, by whose annual appropriations it is sustained, can then defend themselves, must be left hereafter to be determined.

The charge of abuse of appointments at this institution rests not, if it ever existed, where, perhaps, the person making it intended to strike. So far as the present head of the War Department is concerned, his predecessor had taken sufficient precaution to guard against such misuse of power, by anticipating the appointments for the year next succeeding his retirement from that office, as appears by Documents vol. 4, 1st Sess. 19th Cong. No. 5. Since that period the appointments have generally been made from different Congressional Districts, upon the recommendation of the Members.

The catalogue of crimes alleged against the Executive seems not to have been completed till they are accused of doing even legal acts with illegal motives. Yes, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGRAM] if he were to try them, he would try them upon the motive—his pardon—"the quo animo." What and where is his tribunal? Will he bring to us the Inquisition, with its terrors and its tortures? We are not yet prepared for it.

The grave manner in which the statements were made, and the high source whence they come, are the apology, and I feel one is necessary, for a passing comment upon the allegation that the present Administration "is supported by Federalists"—"is opposed by the old Republicans of New England." Such remarks were made in this House—of course were intended for this House. But does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] admit, that his cause is contaminated by the able support of his powerful friend, [Mr. BUCHANAN] who, in his recent address to the House, confessed the fact of federalism? Will he exclude from his communion his many other distinguished coadjutors, liable to the same objection? And does he recollect that the only vote ever yet given to his favourite candidate, North of the Hudson, was given by him [Mr. BAYLIS] whose first political love is now even greater than that to the object of his more recent affection?

In the political party to which the gentleman alludes, there have been political desperadoes, Hotspurs, ultras, whose mad course required the restraints of the good sense of the community. They opposed the Government. What is now done? On this floor we hear it demanded that the President shall resign. But this Nation does not proscribe, by party names merely, whole classes of People—among whom, in her utmost extremity, the country found her Bayards, Dexters, and Grays.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] in his remark that the old Republicans of New England are opposed to the Administration, may perhaps be deceived by the authority upon which he trusts. It is probably the authority of that individual whom he has pronounced "a blackguard"—whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] designated as a "foul libeller." What other epithets the gentleman from Virginia may think he shall deserve, he can best judge, when he shall learn that the same person is exhibiting in public, a real or pretended letter of approbation and compliment, received, or pretended to be received, from the gentleman himself.

If there be now, in this country, a distinction of party, upon principle, it is in the advocates and opponents of the policy of Washington. His theory has been tested by practice—the excitements of the moment are passed—the age has approved, and experience sanctioned it. If there be now, in this Union, an individual (and I hope there is none) who, at this day, shall say that his example ought to be "the guide of his successors," then, from that individual and that party, I would stand aloof. Yes, even the name of Washington ought to abate the fierceness of that rancor which is pouring afresh its calumnies upon him, now no more, but for whom the country might never have known her Washington. In that eventful crisis, when the nation were looking in every direction for a leader of their forces, it was John Adams who, upon the impulse of his own powerful and discerning mind, rose in his place in Congress, and said, "Sir, I nominate George Washington, of Virginia, commander-in-chief." But, sir, they have passed beyond the reach of censure or of praise. History will do justice to them and their accusers. My purpose has been to notice some of the more prominent charges made in this discussion against the present Executive, and I hope I have fulfilled my intention—so far, at least, as to have confined myself to matter of vindication, and to have abstained entirely from recrimination or accusation of others. Our own character, as well as that of the House and the country, seem to me to demand such course.

As I observed, on rising, my original intention was to have moved an amendment to the resolutions, calculated to prevent our attention from being diverted from the real evil—if any exist in the Government—our mode of legislation here. Let us clear our own vision, by first removing such "beams" as obstruct it, before we go in search of "motes." Let us reform the vices at our door, before we get up crusades to India, or the islands of the Pacific, to correct matters of opinion. A moment's attention must convince us that the power of good or evil is with the House.

The resolutions, as first proposed, indicated an attack upon the Clerks and Auditors. After the unnumbered transmutations to which they have been subjected, they have come round again to the Auditors and Clerks. This surely is a safe, if not a gallant war. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGRAM] says, if we include ourselves in this inquiry, all reform will, of course, be defeated. I beg the gentleman not to confess for me: I do not so estimate the principle and patriotism of the House. I do not think that all our zeal ought to be, or will be, exhausted in a clamor against Auditors and Clerks, for whose appointment, compensation, and duties, we have provided. They are men—have the feelings of men—and while discharging, with faithfulness and ability, the duties of their stations, deserve not such epithets as it is too fashionable here to bestow upon them.

They, too, have a right to hold us up to the public. And suppose they were assembled and sitting in judgment upon our course, might they not propose questions which if we would not, they could easily answer? Suppose they should say to Congress, you charge us with working in our offices but six hours a day: what are your usual hours of meeting and adjournment? and what proportion of your time, while in pretended session, is devoted to the business of the House? Do we not discharge all the duties the public require of us? And do you as much? Who fixes our compensation? Who gives us additional perquisites? To what purposes do you apply the stationery of Government; and, with a contemptible article of cutlery, so important in some sections of the country, do you not consent to pocket the abuse?

This they pass, as too small game. But might they not ask us, What is your mode of legislation? And can you not improve that, so as to secure a more prompt and faithful discharge of the business of the Nation? While claimants stand knocking at your door—while the legislation upon the great interests of the country is untouched, what are you doing? Are you not converting this Hall into a mere "Court House yard"—"a crossroad"—"a stump"—from which to address electioneering harangues to your constituents? Such imputation we would indignantly deny, with as much confidence as we could.

harge. Let us overturn these tables—which, for the appropriate duties of legislation, have no more right here than the tables of the money-changers in Temples of Religion. Let us drive from the House that Post Office, which, in the language of a distinguished editor, gives his Hall “the appearance of a folding-room to an immense newspaper establishment.” All the present accommodations may be had by distributing the documents in our lodgings, where they may be examined, instead of in this place, where they are not.

But a greater reform than any contemplated by these resolutions, or which can result from them, may be effected in our mode of appropriations. At a former session of Congress, I submitted resolutions, which will be found on page 118, of the Journal, proposing, generally, a reference of the estimates to the committees upon the different subjects, whose reports, if approved by the House, should be submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the estimates. The session closed before the subject could be acted upon; but I rejoice to find the principle adopted, in part, by a resolution of that committee, recently reported. Projects for reform, however, which promise any good result, in any shape, and from any quarter, shall have my support.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia said: The gentleman who as just taken his seat deprecates inquiry, and seems to consider it an injury to subject the Administration to an inquiry into their conduct. Sir, no Administration could complain of inquiry. The conduct of Alexander Hamilton and Andrew Jackson underwent rigid inquiries in this House; and no other man or set of men should claim to be exempt from inquiry. This is the grand request of the nation, and none are above its examination.

The gentleman said the Constitution contains ample security against abuses by the Executive. It provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but by appropriations made by law. But if, by the power to appoint members of Congress to office, an undue influence is obtained over this body, and large sums of money shall be appropriated by law, and expended lavishly, without particular specification of the objects for which it has been expended, there will be no security against abuses in the expenditure of public money. The gentleman has said, that the President is a man of most unostentatious manners, and we are warned not to prostrate those to whom the nation is indebted for all the elevation it has to boast. It seems, then, that we are to consider the President as one of those to whom the nation is indebted for all the elevation it has to boast. That claim I will examine.

It is contended that inquiry is unnecessary, as the Administration have the confidence of the People. Sir, I deny that the People have ever given their confidence to the President. They have preferred another, who is entitled to their confidence. The President was not elected by the People; nor by Electors chosen by them to give their votes. He was chosen by the Representatives of the People, exercising their own discretion.

[Here Mr. WHIPPLE rose to order. He considered that it was not in order, in a debate on this subject, to go into the history of the Presidential election. The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman from Virginia was in order. Mr. WHIPPLE appealed to the House; but subsequently withdrew his appeal.]

Sir, the Representatives of the People expressed their own opinions, and did not express the opinions of the People. By a statement which I hold in my hand, made by another, but which I suppose to be correct, it appears that of the votes of the People, General Jackson received 153,634; Mr. Adams, 105,205; and Mr. Crawford, 47,665—so that General Jackson received more votes of the People than Mr. Adams and Mr. Crawford united—of the Electors chosen by the People, Jackson had 84, and Adams 48; while, of the Electors chosen by State Legislatures, Adams had 36, and Jackson 15—the whole number of Electors for Jackson being 99, and for Adams 84. In five States General Jackson received 30 Electoral votes, while only 7 were given against him; yet, those five States, by their Representatives on this floor, voted against him. The Electors are chosen to express the vote of the People, to do which they are pledged. The Representatives consider themselves at liberty to exercise their own judgment. Had the Representatives of the People given the same vote which the Electors of those five States gave, in obedience to the will of the people, General Jackson would have been elected President. He would then have had twelve States; and there can be no doubt that another of the States which voted for Mr. Crawford, would ultimately have voted for him. Sir, the People did not elect Mr. Adams, although he is President by the forms of the Constitution.

[Mr. WHIPPLE again rose, and asked the SPEAKER, if the gentleman [Mr. S.] was in order. The SPEAKER replied, that the gentleman from Virginia was in order; that a wide range had been allowed in the debate, and it was not for him to foresee what application the gentleman from Virginia would make of his remarks.]

Let us examine the public life of Mr. Adams, and see if he is so eminently entitled to the confidence of the nation, that it is wrong to make an inquiry into his Administration. Passing over the writings of Mr. Adams, bearing the signature of Publius, in answer to Paine's Rights of Man, which first brought Mr. Adams into notice; let us accompany him into the Senate of the United States. There we find that he voted against taking possession of Louisiana, and every measure proposed concerning that Territory—even against making roads through the Indian country to New Orleans. We next find him one of a Committee of three members, who brought in a bill to suspend the writ of habeas corpus; (a measure of which a good deal has been said;) a measure which would have endangered your liberty, and mine, and that of every man in the country, from Maine to Georgia; and for what cause? Because a despicable riot or rout had occurred on the Mississippi, which the constables were sufficient to have put down. Yes, Mr. Adams concurred in an attempt to suspend the writ of habeas corpus; not in a beleaguered town; not in the case of an individual who excited mutiny; but to suspend it as to the whole Nation. These are some of the services which it seems have made Mr. Adams the choice of the Representatives of that quarter of the Union!

Let us now examine the services rendered by Mr. Adams as a Foreign Minister. He went to Portugal; what did he do there? Nothing. To Prussia; what did he do there? Nothing. To Russia; what there? Nothing. To Ghent; there we must give him credit for one fifth part of the negotiation. But other Ministers say that Mr. Adams proposed to cede the free navigation of the Mississippi to the enemy. Sir, the Mississippi rises and runs its course in the territory of the United States; and our Ministers might, with as much propriety, have ceded to the British the free navigation of the Potomac. Consider what would have been the consequences had the free navigation of the Mississippi been ceded to Great Britain. You could not then have stopped their ships at New Orleans, or any other port, or place. Your country would have been inundated with goods from the Mississippi, which had paid no duties; and thus our revenue laws would be defrauded. The Indians would have been supplied with goods, and their trade engrossed. It is much to be regretted that we have not yet been favored with the developments, promised to be given at some propitious time, of the proceedings of the open day and secret night of the negotiators at Ghent. This proposition does not manifest eminent wisdom on the part of Mr. Adams.

The next treaty negotiated by Mr. Adams, which I shall notice, is the treaty with Spain. In that treaty, Mr. Adams relinquished to the Spanish Crown the extensive Province of Texas, although Don Onís, the Spanish Minister, in a book published by him, has admitted that the country thus surrendered belonged to the United States. I will next come to the treaty made by the eminent negotiator, with France. That treaty contains the following provisions: The manufactures and produce of France, imported in French vessels, pay in the United States $3 75 additional duty by the ton of merchandise, more than if imported in American vessels, while the manufactures and produce of the United States, imported into France in American vessels, pay there a similar additional duty; but in fixing what shall be the ton of merchandise, a bale of French silk, of the content of 50 cubic feet, which will weigh 1,100 lbs. and be worth 4,400 dollars, is a ton; while a bale of cotton, weighing 804 lbs. and worth 80 dollars, is a ton, and pays an equal extra duty with such a bale of silk; so a bale of French broad cloth weighing 930 lbs. and worth 3,600 dollars, will pay no more of this extra duty than such a bale of cotton. I will add, that these estimates of weight and value of the French productions were made by a Collector of the Revenue.

Passing from the conduct of Mr. Adams, as a negotiator of treaties, we find him in the Presidential chair, by the election of the Representatives in Congress. I will say nothing of the doctrines contained in his inaugural Address, and Message, which have already been commented on by others. I will ask if any thing is more likely to prove dangerous to the rights and liberties of the People, than making the press venal? Considering the importance of the press, its influence in forming public opinion, it may be exceedingly dangerous to virtue. Why has not the press been left perfectly free and uninfluenced? Has there not been an effort made by the Administration to bring the press under influence? Have the judgments of those intelligent men who direct the press been left unbiassed?—

[Here Mr. WHIPPLE interposed, and called Mr. SMYTH to order, and wished to know if it was in order to discuss the liberty of the press on the question before the House.]

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Virginia was not out of order. The application and bearing of the remarks to the question under consideration, he presumed the gentleman intended to show.

Mr. SMYTH said, in an under tone, but so as to be heard over a considerable part of the House, "He cannot possibly be sober;" some other member, near Mr. SMYTH, said, "He certainly must be drunk."

Mr. WHIPPLE again rose; when,

Mr. SMYTH called him to order.

The CHAIR required both members to take their seats.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, then said, I call the gentleman from Virginia to order: he has openly offered to a member of this House a gross personal insult.

The CHAIR inquired of the gentleman from Kentucky to what he alluded, and the manner in which the gentleman from Virginia had insulted any member of the House?

Mr. CLARK replied, by his saying that the gentleman from New Hampshire is not sober.

The SPEAKER said, that if such a remark had been made by the gentleman from Virginia, whilst upon the floor, and addressing the House, it was not only a violation of order, but a high indignity offered to the House itself. The Chair certainly heard no such remark, or he should have enforced its authority.

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina rose, and said the gentleman had made the remark, not for the House, but only to the gentlemen sitting near him.

Mr. CLARK: Then the gentleman admits the fact, and I call him to order.

The SPEAKER again repeated, that if such a remark had been made, it was a violation of order and highly indecorous. If the Chair had heard it, he should have promptly interposed, and not only have called the member to order, but would not have permitted him to proceed, without the assent of the House. But no such remark had reached the ear of the SPEAKER. He could not, therefore, pronounce the gentleman from Virginia out of order, for remarks not made on the floor, or intended for the House.

Mr. CLARK asked if the gentleman was to proceed?—he had openly accused a member of the House with intoxication—and he wished to know what course was to be pursued, towards a member so violating the decorum of the House.

The SPEAKER replied, that, if the gentleman from Kentucky wished to proceed with the question of order, (for disorderly words spoken) he must reduce the words, said to have been uttered by the gentleman from Virginia, to writing!

Mr. CLARK replied, I will do so; and if they are denied, I wish to understand what will be the course of proceeding.

The CHAIR suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky, that he might reduce the words to writing, and reserve any further proceeding upon the subject until the gentleman from Virginia had concluded his speech.

Mr. CLARK declined doing so, and said, he was induced to act as he now did, because, although he had stated the fact to the Chair, the SPEAKER had signified that he did not know that the gentleman from Virginia had used any such language, thereby impeaching his veracity in the assertion.

The SPEAKER rose and addressed the House. He disclaimed any intention to impeach the veracity of the gentleman from Kentucky, or wound his feelings. The remark which he had made did not justify such an interpretation. His respect for the character of that gentleman and the House, forbade it. He had stated to the House, as a justification of his own conduct in not interposing, that he had heard no such remark from the gentleman from Virginia. If he had, he should instantly have called to order; and hold the member responsible. He regretted, extremely, the unpleasant character which the debate had assumed, and had used every effort in his power to prevent it, and to preserve the order and dignity of the House. He hoped all excitement would cease, and desired that the gentleman from Virginia might proceed.

Mr. COULTER said, the gentleman from Virginia had been repeatedly interrupted while speaking—he hoped this would not be suffered to take place again, unless in a proper and parliamentary manner.

Mr. SMYTH said, that he had made no such remark, as addressed to the House, or in any part of his speech—it was spoken aside, and in consequence of the suggestion to the same effect, of several gentlemen near him. He had had no purpose of violating the order of the House, and if he had done so, he prayed the House to pardon him.]

Mr. SMYTH then resumed. An order has been laid before us, given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Collector at Philadelphia, directing him to purchase the stationery necessary for his office from a certain able editor of a newspaper. Why was not the Collector, in a city like Philadelphia, allowed to purchase the stationery necessary for his office from whom he pleased? This order proves the desire of the Administration to bring the press under its influence. Another able editor was selected as a bearer of despatches. Why, of all the men in this nation, was an editor of a newspaper, who ought always to e found at his desk, selected as the bearer of despatches to Buenos Ayres? He did not carry the despatches, but e is allowed to retain the money. He sent them, it is id, by the captain of a ship, who might as well have received them at first. I admit that although he did not take the voyage to Buenos Ayres, he has the same right o retain the compensation that Mr. Adams has to retain e 1,500 dollars which he received for a journey, which e never performed, from Ghent to St. Petersburg. It is otorious that the printing of the laws has been taken from veral editors of papers, and transferred to others. This ews that the administration are unwilling to leave the res free. Let the People support such papers as they lease. But let not the money of the people be given y the Heads of Departments to such editors of newspa- ers as will consent to support the Administration, right r wrong.

An able gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHERMAN] onsiders the patronage in the hands of the Administra- on as rather an injury than a benefit to them. The dministration do not seem to think so; they are willing o increase this patronage. The laws entrust to the Post- aster General the power to appoint the deputy Post- asters. During a former Administration, when the of- ce at Albany was vacant, the President refused to inter- e in making the appointment. When the office at ashville was vacant, during the present Administration, nderstand that the President made the selection of a eputy Postmaster, and not the Postmaster General. Sir, ere is manifestly a disposition, on the part of the Ad- inistration, to increase the number of its appointments id thus to extend its influence. I will say nothing of e Panama mission which has been noticed by other entlemen. I speak of appointments of officers of theavy. And here I may be permitted to say, that, if there e any members of this House more friendly to the Navy an I am, they are very few. Many more appointments an the service required have recently been made of eutenants and Midshipmen, and these appointments are ill going on. It seems, by the Register furnished us, at, when it was made out, there were 143 Midshipmen ho had not received their warrants; 59 appointments ear date during the last year; yet, by the estimate of e Secretary of the Navy, there are now unemployed, nd returned as "waiting orders," 13 Captains, 7 Master ommandants, 111 Lieutenants, 12 Surgeons, 11 Surgeons' lates, 8 Purasers, 85 Midshipmen, 2 Carpenters, and 1 ailmaker; and on furlough, 3 Lieutenants, 2 Surgeons' lates, and 1 Midshipman. Those "waiting orders" and oing nothing, are in the receipt of their full pay and oluments, amounting to $165,097 50 cents; those on irlough receive $1,832 75 cents—in all, $166,930 25 ents, which sum is paid to officers of the Navy, annually, ho are rendering no services. I ask, sir, when there e 85 Midshipmen, and 111 Lieutenants unemployed, hat can be the object of making so many new appoint- ents, unless it be to extend the influence of the Admin- istration by patronage?

Let us now consider some of the political opinions hich have been expressed by Mr. Adams. In a letter ritten by him to Levit Harris, in 1814, what did he, hom the Government had fostered and cherished more an any other man in the United States, say of the Go- ernment? He said at that trying time, that the Go- ernment was weak. Is this true? Sir, I recollect to ave seen many years since in print, an assertion made y a distinguished member of Congress [Mr. Sedgewick] o this effect; he said that the Government has power, y the Constitution, to take every man in the nation by a militia law, and make him a soldier; and to take every cent of money in the nation, by laws imposing taxes. his claim of power appeared to me to be enormous; ut, on reflection, I found that I could not deny that the Government did possess this power. Can this Govern- ment, possessing such powers, be said to be weak? As this Government possesses these powers, and also rests on the affections of the People, what other Government is so strong? Perhaps Mr. Adams meant, that, although the Government possesses all these powers, it is not suffi- ciently stable, because here is no hereditary power. Per- haps he entertains opinions, expressed by another distin- guished individual, who said that, "And if I should undertake to say that there never was a good Government in the world, that did not consist of the three simple species of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, I think I may make it good." Again: "I shall show that a nobility or gentry, in a popular Government, not over- balancing it, is the very life and soul of it." And again: "From this example as from all others, it appears, that there can be no Government of laws without a balance, and that there can be no balance without three orders, and that even three orders can never balance each other, unless each in its department is independent and absolute." Is this the kind of strength which Mr. Adams de- sires that the Government should possess? When the Government already possesses unlimited power to get men and money, would he add the stability of hereditary power?

Mr. Adams also said that the Government is penurious. What reason had he to say the Government was penu- rious? I find, in one line of the documents, that Mr. Adams received from the Government, as a Foreign Minis- ter, $119,000; and this is not near the whole of the amount which he received. When Mr. Adams considered as penurious the Government which made such allow- ances as are found here, [exhibiting a volume of the docu- ments] what can the gentleman consider as liberal and just? He considers these immense sum, as only proving that the Government is penurious. Is not this sufficient to teach the People to be on their guard, and to hold him to a strict accountability?

I will not add any thing to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] as to the receipt and retention of $4,500 for an outfit, more than was allowed by law, and of $1,500 received for a journey never performed. In a Court of Law he would, by the verdict of a Jury, have been compelled to refund the money. The sending of the money by Mr. Monroe did not give Mr. Adams a right to it, unless the law allowed it to him. It was a mistake; and the money should have been refunded. When such were the habits of extortion of Mr. Adams, when in an inferior station, it is the more necessary, when he has come to the Government, that he should be held to a strict accountability. Considering that the President was not elected by the People, neither a negative nor even a good Administration should recon- cile them to the manner in which he came into power.

Frequent allusions have been made, in this debate, to the distinguished man opposed to Mr. Adams. An ad- dress from a Convention held in Richmond has been in- troduced, and partly read, on this floor, which contains several assertions, which I am pleased to have an oppor- tunity to contradict. In this address, it is said of General Jackson, that he filled, successively, for very short periods, sundry enumerated offices. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHERMAN] drew a comparison between the services, in civil Government, of General Washington and General Jackson, the object of which seemed to be, to shew, that General Washington, before he came to the Presidential Chair, had great experience in civil Government, and, thereby, was qualified to dis- charge the duties of President, leaving it to be inferred, that General Jackson had not that experience, and, therefore, was not qualified to discharge those duties. Sir, General Washington had been a member of the House of Burgesses; a member of the Congress of

Retrenchment.

[Feb. 6, 1828.]

1775, one month; a member of the Federal Convention, four months. In these situations, I presume that he never made a motion or delivered an argument. It was not by experience in either, or all of these situations, that General Washington became qualified to preside over the United States. General Jackson has been a member of the State Convention of Tennessee; a member of the General Assembly; a member of the House of Representatives, and of the Senate of the United States; Attorney General of Tennessee, and Judge of the Supreme Court for six years, (no very short period;) afterwards member of the Senate of the United States, a second time. So that, as to experience in civil government, that of General Jackson is as ten to one greater than that of General Washington, before he became President of the U. States. Far be it from me, sir, to attempt to elevate Gen. Jackson above Gen. Washington; but, it was not experience in civil government that qualified him to preside over the United States. It was in commanding, during seven years, the Armies of the United States, that he acquired experience, and showed his fitness to govern.

It has been said that General Jackson abandoned the civil situation in which he had been placed; that he quitted Congress in 1798. General Jackson was in the Senate, in a small minority, where his efforts were useless. At the same time, by the same cause, James Madison was driven from the House of Representatives, and went into the State Legislature. Charles J. Fox retired from Parliament, when he found his efforts hopeless.

The document I have mentioned, (Address of the Adams Convention at Richmond) charges General Jackson with "the arrest, trial, and execution, of six militiamen, who were guilty of no other offence than the assertion, of their lawful right to return home, after their legal term of service had expired." This clause contains falsehoods. It is not true that General Jackson arrested these militiamen; nor is it true, that their only offence was desiring to go home, after their term of service had expired. Their term of service had not expired. In a letter from Governor Blount, to the Secretary of War, written in the Autumn of 1814, is this clause: "This is mentioned, with a view of giving to you all the information possessed here, of troops in service from this State, (as you have lately come into the War Department,) and, in addition to the above mentioned, there is in service from this State, 1,000 men, at the posts in the Creek country. They were called out for six months, and have nearly three months yet to serve. But, independent of these, there is now 2,500 militia of this State in service, under a requisition from the War Department of the 4th July." The six men did not belong to this last body, for they were mustered into service in June, for six months.

Mr. SMYTH said, that the paper from which he had been reading, was copied from one of the documents before the military committee, which had been transmitted from the War Department.

Mr. WHIPPLE inquired of the Speaker whether it was in order for a member to read in the House, from documents which were before a committee, and on which that committee were to report to the House?

The SPEAKER decided it to be out of order.

Mr. SMYTH said he stood corrected.]

Sir, it is not because that Gen. Jackson is a military man, that he is objectionable in the eyes of some men. He was taken up by the People, and it is on the People he rests, and not on the aristocracy of the country. He is the democratic candidate. I speak not with reference to former parties. I mean that he is the candidate of the People.

I will now come to the consideration of expenditures and retrenchment. John A. King received 4,500 dollars besides his salary, for staying 8 or 9 weeks in his lodgings at London; and this contrary to the usage of the Government, which is to allow an outfit to those who are commissioned as Chargé des Affaires; but, Mr. King, as I understand, and as has been stated in another body, never was commissioned Chargé des Affaires by the President. As to the billiard table, purchased as a part of the furniture of the President's house, if precedent shall be considered a justification, I think the President may be justified. A former President had among the furniture of his house, a carriage and horses; then, why should not the present President be allowed, as a part of his household furniture, chessmen and a billiard table?

As to the proposed reduction of the pay of members of Congress; if it is proposed to reduce the compensation of members of Congress, Heads of Departments, and other officers of the Government, to the rate of compensation first given to each, I have no objection to the measure. If it is proposed to reduce the compensation of members of Congress, without a reduction, as suggested, of the salaries of Heads of Departments and the higher classes of officers, I protest against it. It is dangerous to degrade, in their compensation the immediate Representatives of the People. The compensation of a member of Congress for a session of four months, will be 1,000 dollars, besides his travelling charges; that is, about the amount of salary allowed to clerks of the lowest grades in the public offices. Money has influence; and, if members of Congress are paid too low a compensation, such trifling offices in the gift of the Executive, will be sought after by members of this House, and the influence of the President will thus be increased to the danger of the independence of this body. Even at the present rate of compensation, members of Congress have been found to accept the offices of Collector, Receiver, Register, Deputy Postmaster, Indian Agent, &c.

The best rule for reform will be, not to starve any useful service. Where the office is not necessary, put it down, and let the officers retained work. As to the Military Academy, I would not touch the institution; but, I would provide that the sons of the wealthy should pay tuition fees, and their own expenses. The sons of officers who died in service, and poor, might be educated at the public expense by resolution of Congress; not regarding it as a charity but as a distinction. It certainly never was considered as a reflection on the sons of General Mercer, that the Assembly of Virginia ordered that they should be educated at the public expense. Such a resolution would be an honour, equal to conferring a medal or a sword. I would not allow the Secretary of War to select for education at this institution, the sons of wealthy and influential men, and thus extend Executive patronage.

Our foreign missions I deem unnecessarily extended. Why have we a Minister of the highest grade in Spain, a subject kingdom, occupied by the troops of a foreign power? What treaty do we desire to obtain? Why do we continue a Minister at Mexico? Why not leave our affairs there to the care of a Chargé? In many countries, we have no Minister of any grade, and yet our commerce goes on well without them. I deem it expedient for this House to limit the extent of our diplomatic intercourse, and not trust altogether to Executive discretion, particularly as the President has pronounced the Government penurious. Sir, the less we have of this diplomatic intercourse with foreign courts, the better. It is an intercourse which does not tend to confirm good principles. It introduces and cherishes duplicity, fraud, craft, and dissimulation. I have been told, by one well skilled in the diplomacy of European Courts, that dishonorable practices, such as opening of letters, are common. The so-reign Ministers among us, and the Heads of Departments, by their splendid entertainments, diffuse a taste for pomp and show, and thence extravagance spreads throughout the land.

Sir, there are other subjects, on which I intended to have addressed the House, but it is late, and I will close my remarks.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, obtained the floor, and was about to address the Chair, when

Mr. McHATTON made a point of order—the gentleman from Ohio had made at least two speeches on this question already—he certainly ought not to claim the floor exclusively to himself.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Ohio was in order, as he had not yet spoken on the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT was about to proceed, when

Mr. CARTER moved an adjournment.

Mr. STOWER demanded the Yeas and Nays, on the question of adjournment, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. CARTER having withdrawn his motion for adjournment, it was immediately renewed by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and the Yeas and Nays were again demanded on it by Mr. INGHAM. They were taken accordingly; and the motion to adjourn was decided in the negative. Yeas 52, Nays 106.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said, he was glad the House had refused to adjourn. He had yielded the floor for the motion, on the request of gentlemen near him, not because he wished to avoid proceeding with his remarks now, but because he was aware members must be fatigued at this late hour, and of his inability by any effort he could make to compensate for the delay; it was not, however, his wish the House should adjourn. He would proceed to notice some of the remarks which had fallen from several gentlemen, who had preceded him; but, in doing so, he could not follow the example of others, and promise to be brief. He had, he said, many things to say, perhaps not high matters, but many things; and he did not intend to take his seat, until he had noticed the points on his memorandum, though to do so might occasion a considerable consumption of time. He would endeavor, to the extent of his powers, to do justice to the subjects he noticed, and to the parties whose characters were involved in the controversy that had been carried on during this debate. He used the word controversy, as more appropriate to describe this discussion, than would be the subject under consideration, or the resolutions. He hoped, while he proceeded, to observe a due respect for the House, and not lose sight of the controversy. He did not, certainly, intend to run into an examination of the public and private characters and opinions of the two candidates before the People for the Presidency, to the extent the example of gentlemen on the other side would warrant; but, as the example had been set, he should advert to those topics, and reply to the attack on the merits and services of Mr. Adams, and notice briefly, by way of fair offset, some of the merits and services of Gen. Jackson, in which he might recall to the querulous minds of gentlemen, some things which have been forgotten. He should speak plain, but it was not his purpose to say any thing personally offensive to any one. He knew of no individual, or the friends of the Administration, who had impugned the character of Gen. Jackson; but if gentlemen on the other side chose to commence a tilting match against the reputation of the President, the Heads of Departments, and the friends and supporters of the Administration, on the question now before the House, he hoped to be excused, if, in endeavoring to repel attacks that he considered unfounded and unjustifiable, which had been urged as objections to the re-election of Mr. Adams, he should allude to some traits in the character of his only opponent, which, if they failed to disqualify that individual to take his place, certainly deprived him of claim to exclusive consideration before the American People. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH] who had just taken his seat, he said, had undertaken to enquire into the opinions and services of Mr. Adams, public and private, to show him unworthy the confidence of the People; he, Mr. W. thought the contrast of some of these with the opinions and services of General Jackson would not result much to the advantage of the General.

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. W., the gentleman from Virginia has adverted to the writings of a patriot of the Revolution, now no more, to prove the monarchical tendency of the present Administration! How do the writings of other men, in former times, fix the charge upon the President and his cabinet, of entertaining aristocratical sentiments, or feelings favorable to monarchy? He has adverted, also, to the writings of Publicola, and to the letter of Mr. Adams to Levi Harris, which has been so frequently introduced and commented upon by gentlemen who had preceded him. Sir, would the gentleman harrow up the ashes of the dead, to injure the character of the present Administration? Will he invade the repose of the grave, and involve the disturbed manes of Revolutionary worthies and patriots, to aid in the destruction of the present Administration? The letter to Harris, from the manner of its introduction, and the emphatic tone in which the extract from it was read, seemed to be relied on, as conclusively showing the aristocratical and even monarchical opinions of Mr. Adams, and his utter contempt of Republican government. I have known the gentleman from Virginia for several years, and have attentively observed his Congressional course; but have never witnessed in him any thing so unfair as his quotation from that letter, and the use made of it. I am unwilling to believe the gentleman intended it. Sir, the quotation made, the text from which the gentleman deduces his conclusions, has been unwarrantably torn from its context, to fit it to party purposes; the meaning of the writer is wholly perverted! If the gentleman had read the remainder of the paragraph from which he quoted, he would have found infused into the whole a patriotism as warm, fervent, pure, as ever filled a patriot bosom!—He would have found, moreover, an undoubting conviction of the justice of our cause, and as firm a reliance upon the continued regard of that superintending Providence, which had hitherto protected our country amidst trials and difficulties of much greater magnitude, and guided its destinies, through war and peace, to unexampled prosperity as ever man felt! He might have found the opinion hazarded, that, notwithstanding the appalling dangers which threatened our country, the virtue and valor of the American People would overcome them all—and, thank God, what he predicted, has since been verified! The virtue and valor of this People has overcome all those dangers. I do not say, sir, that the gentleman from Virginia intended to mangle this letter; but I may say, it has been torn and mangled to answer party purposes, and garbled and false extracts spread throughout the whole country as true. This may be all right among overheated partisans—I complain not of it; but I may be permitted to say, that the cause which requires such efforts to sustain it—the cause which cannot be sustained by the employment of other and fairer means, ought not to be sustained at all. The People of the United States are too virtuous and intelligent to support a cause resting on a foundation like this. I do not mistake the People, sir: let them be informed of this unfair course, and they will neither approve nor support the party that resorts to it. The gentleman from Virginia has adverted to the writings of one, now no more, upon the checks and balances of Government, to prove—what? That the present Administration are obnoxious to the charge of being desirous of introducing into our Governaristocratical—nay, monarchical principles, destructive of the republic!

[Mr. SMYTH explained. He had said, that one party—the Jackson party—rested on the People, not on the aristocracy of the country, for support.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. Well, sir, if there are but two parties, and one rests on the People, not on the aristocracy, the other must rest on the aristocracy: from this there is no escape. But, why did the gentleman quote writings and doctrines of another person, to prove the present Chief Magistrate and his Cabinet aristocratic and monarchical? Is not the charge I suppose fairly inferrible from the gentleman's remarks? Why else talk significantly about the three orders of kings, nobles, and commons? Without the meaning I attribute to the language, it has no pertinence to the controversy. Will truth warrant the gentleman in asserting—is he himself satisfied, that the cause of General Jackson alone rests on the People? Does not the Administration rest also on the People, and receive a full proportion of their confidence and support? Let gentlemen reflect on this matter, and inquire in what portions of this country aristocratical tendencies and institutions are found, and in what portions General Jackson's main strength lies. We do not fear the scrutiny. I would not do General Jackson injustice; but I will repel this undeserved attack on the Administration and its friends. There is no evidence on which to rest it. Sir, who are the individuals composing the Administration thus charged with enforcing aristocratical principles—nay, principles tending to the establishment of a monarchy? Has the head of the Administration ever uttered or written a syllable warranting such a charge? Has any one of the heads of Departments done either? If so where can it be found? Aristocratic and monarchical indeed! Will gentlemen look at the President; reflect upon the primitive simplicity of his manners, his unexampled plainness, his habitual and untiring personal attention to the business duties of his station, and then talk of his aristocracy and kingly pomp? Sir, where is there a gentleman around me, equally plain, equally republican in his habits and manners, equally devoted to his duties? He has nothing aristocratic about him. He is the least of a courtier I have seen in public life. Sir, is the plain, unostentatious individual at the head of the Department of State, an aristocrat or monarchist? Do his long continued services in the democratic party of this country, in various stations; services, beneficial as well to the great interests of the country as to the cause of liberty and free government, give authority to denounce him as an aristocrat or a monarchist? The charge is at war with the whole course of his life, and a censure upon the vast number of republican people who have given him their confidence. How is it, sir, as to the high-minded honorable Virginian, who is at the head of the Department of War? Is he an aristocrat and a monarchist? Where have these principles been made manifest in his political or private conduct? He was reared in the democratic school of the Ancient Dominion. Does the gentleman from Virginia denounce that school as aristocratic or monarchical? He had the confidence of that republican commonwealth, and of Jefferson and Madison. Is that evidence of his aristocratic or monarchical principles? He received the highest honors of his State, was made its Governor, and sent here to the Senate, by the republican party. Is the evidence of his aristocratic or monarchical principles found here? Sir, I should be loth to advance such a charge against a faithful and long-tried public servant, and I am, indeed, surprised that it is advanced by a citizen of Virginia. How is this charge sustained against the individual who presides, certainly without discredit to himself or the country, over the affairs of the Navy Department? Is he, too, a monarchist, an aristocrat? I call upon gentlemen not to forbear the use of their senses, but to reflect before they promulgate to the American People and the world, that this officer holds such obnoxious doctrines. How as to the other citizen of Virginia—the virtuous, classical, and eloquent Attorney General—is he, too, an aristocrat? Are his principles monarchical? Examining the history of his life, private and public, I am unable to find such principles or practices, as those imputed; but, on the contrary, correct republican principles, and a faithful discharge of his official duties. Where can the gentleman from Virginia find evidence that this member of the cabinet is a monarchist or an aristocrat? Sir, I am unable to find a tittle of proof of these dangerous principles, in either of the officers alluded to, and I have noticed all the members of the cabinet, except one—the head of the Treasury Department. Where will the gentleman point to evidence of any thought, or word, or deed, of his, monarchical or aristocratic? If the gentleman from Virginia seeks to know the origin of this individual, and he will direct his eye to that print, (pointing to the Declaration of Independence,) he will find the name of his father affixed to the instrument which declared this nation free and independent. He will find there, also, the name of his maternal grandfather. Will he not be satisfied from this, that the blood is purely republican? Need I go farther? Has the son deviated from the footsteps, and disregarded the instructions of the parent? Will the gentleman direct my attention to any act of his life, public or private, that evidences his monarchical or aristocratic predilections? Will he give us some facts upon which to rest? He will not only find this individual without a drop of monarchical or aristocratical blood in his veins, but he will be unable, after the severest scrutiny into his life, to find one act tending to the establishment of monarchy or aristocracy. Sir, the lives and public services of these republican patriots, have added to the prosperity of this country; and have shed a lustre upon its history and the principles of our Government, entitling them to the confidence and respect, and even the gratitude, of the People; and the charge of their entertaining aristocratic or monarchical principles has no foundation in truth; it is in direct hostility to the whole tenor of their lives. Sir, the services of these distinguished sons of the republic will be remembered, and their characters and virtues will be cherished with lively interest by the American People, long after this controversy is forgotten, affording proof of merit, to posterity, that will outweigh the writings of ten thousand Publicolas—they rest, with confidence, upon the doctrines of the Revolution and of the Constitution. I will say, moreover, (even if I give occasion to a gentleman from New York, near me, to write another vituperative letter to a New York editor,) that, if this Administration is to be pulled down, it must be by the influence of some other charges than those brought forward by the gentleman from Virginia. I will not inquire into their pertinence to the subject. The resolution is for inquiry into the propriety of retrenching extravagant and profligate expenditures. The individual opinions of those who administer the Government, upon the abstract question of the best structure of Government, has doubtless a direct bearing on the question.

The gentleman from Virginia has reverted to a document used by others in this discussion, and accuses the President of having received $1,500, for a journey never performed, and charges, that he wrongfully obtained and retains this money. He asserts, that, if suit were brought for it, any jury would be compelled to give a verdict for the amount, and that the law would enforce a recovery back, on the ground of its being paid by mistake. This matter has been fully explained by gentlemen who have preceded me, and every objectionable feature in the transaction removed, yet, it is again repeated. I will not weary your patience with repeating the explanation; nei-er the House nor the country has forgotten it. Sir, the gentleman is an eminent lawyer. I am a lawyer, too, but with no great pretensions to eminence; yet I will venture the opinion, that the legal principle is not in accordance with the gentleman's assertion. My recollection of a legal principle, in such cases, is this: that, where money has been deliberately paid, or paid upon the decision of a tribunal authorized by law to decide the question, the payment is binding upon the parties and all the world, and conclusive of the rights in controversy. If I am correct, an appeal to a court of law, in the case instanced by the gentleman, would result in a verdict in favor of Mr. Adams. This was certainly no case of money paid by mistake—it was deliberately paid, and sanctioned by former Administrations, upon full consideration, and according to the usage of the Government. Mr. Adams invited a suit against him, and would have waived his right to obtain a judicial decision on the principle, but the constituted authorities were satisfied with it.

The gentleman has read from a document, which he says has been introduced here and read. I am not certainly advised what paper he read from, but I understand it to be an address from a convention of citizens in Virginia, opposed to the election of Gen. Jackson. The extract read by the gentleman, contains observations on the subject of the six militiamen, executed at Mobile, by order of the Commanding General; and I understand the gentleman as saying, that, in relation to this matter, the paper contains an absolute falsehood! Sir, this is a lie, if not a bold charge. I ask, what member has introduced and read that paper here? Has it been printed by order of the House? What remarks have been made upon its contents, calling forth the species of attack the gentleman has made upon it? I have heard no comment upon that paper, except from one person, on the same day with the gentleman from Virginia, who named its author, and spoke of its circulation by members of Congress. This document, sir, originated in the Commonwealth of Virginia; it has been published by a numerous convention of her sons; its author, though, personally, unknown to me, is reputed to sustain the character of a gentleman, of strict honour, of high and commanding talents and acquirements, and of unquestionable integrity. He obnoxious to the charge of uttering an absolute falsehood? Have the members of that convention uttered absolute falsehoods? The gentleman who makes the accusation, represents a part of the same Commonwealth, of which the author and publishers of the document, are citizens. It cannot be expected of me to defend against this charge, or do more than leave the parties concerned, to settle the matter amongst themselves. The gentleman made allusion to the documents now before the Military Committee, heretofore ordered to be printed by this House, but, as he was pronounced out of order in that House, I will not reply to it.

The gentleman from Virginia had undertaken to show that the claims of General Jackson to the presidency were superior to those of General Washington ten times told! Sir, I hope never to feel myself under the necessity, in the Hall, of Representatives of the American People, of defending the character of him who was, truly and emphatically, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Is it, indeed, true, that General Jackson's qualifications for the Presidency are superior to those of Washington, ten times told? Is an American citizen found, to proclaim to the world that they are even equal?

[Mr. SMYTH desired to explain. He did not say so; but had only said the civil experience of General Jackson was longer and greater than that of General Washington.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I am happy to receive the explanation of the gentleman, and to have his statement in a less exceptionable shape than I before understood it. But, sir, is it true that the civil qualifications of General Jackson, resulting from experience or otherwise, are superior to those of Washington, ten times told, or at all? It is not the first time that attempts have been made, I will not say to disparage the well-earned fame of Washington, but to elevate the character of General Jackson, by boldly putting forth a comparison of his merits with those of Washington. It has been done here and elsewhere. General Jackson is set forth as the second Washington, equal, and, as now said, superior to the first. All admit the public and private course of Washington was such as to excite the admiration of the world, and to be worthy of imitation. The friends of General Jackson now endeavour to secure his elevation by comparing him with Washington, and to inculcate the belief that the Administration of that great and good man will be the guide of that of Gen. Jackson—the example that he will follow and imitate. Sir, let me inquire, for a moment, whether the recorded opinions and conduct of General Jackson are not directly adverse to the claims of his friends in that behalf, and are not entirely destructive of all hope of his following the footsteps of Washington: nay, further, if they do not furnish irrefutable evidence that he condemns the policy of Washington, condemns his Administration—regarding both as furnishing nothing to be approved, nothing worthy of being followed? Sir, I hope I shall be deemed in order while I advert to the Journal of this House, of the 14th of December, 1796, which I hold in my hand. I find the House of Representatives, on that day engaged in considering an Address to General Washington, then President, approving, on the part of the nation—of the language of whose hearts the Representatives, in that particular, thought themselves the faithful interpreters—the course of his wise, firm, and patriotic Administration; expressing the gratitude and admiration of his countymen for the resplendent virtues and talents which had essentially contributed to our success in the Revolutionary struggle, and in the establishment, on a firm basis, of our free Constitution, affording examples rare and instructive to mankind; their regret that he was about to retire; their wish that he might long enjoy that liberty which was so dear to him, and to which his name will ever be dear, and that his own virtues and the nation's prayers, might obtain the happiest sunshine for the decline of his days, and the choicest of future blessings; that, for the country's sake, for the sake of Republican Liberty, his example might be the guide of his successors, and thus, after being the ornament and safeguard of the age, become the patrimony of their descendants. I will not detain you, sir, to read these proceedings at length. Gentlemen can find them in the Journal of the Second Session of the Fourth Congress, p. 34. I will only read the names of those members who voted against adopting this Address, and I request the particular attention of the House and the nation to some of them [Mr. W. then read as follows: "Those who voted in the negative, are, Thomas Blount, Isaac Coles, WILLIAM B. GILES, Christopher Greenup, James Holland, ANDREW JACKSON, EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Samuel McClay, Nathaniel Macon, and Abraham Venable."] The gentleman from Virginia, I suppose, finds here evidence of the civil qualifications of General Jackson. Is this an item of his evidence of the superiority of General Jackson's qualifications for the Presidency over those of General Washington? Sir, the course of the gentleman's remarks required of me the production of this record, important in its character. It is a document which calls loudly upon the gentleman to pause and reflect: it is one the American People will read with the deepest interest, and seriously ponder upon! It furnishes irrefutable evidence that General Jackson himself disapproved and condemned the example of the great Washington, and was unwilling to establish it as the guide of his successors! Sir, after this, what will this nation think? What will the civilized world say of the claim put forth by the gentleman from Virginia, that he who was emphatically the only one of his class; that he whose course has excited the admiration of all nations; that he, the sound of whose name excites the just pride and warms the heart, not only of every American, but of every lover of liberty throughout the world; that he whose reputation is his country's glory; had less qualifications for civil rule—say, ten times told, less qualifications—than General Jackson!

The gentleman from Virginia said, that General Washington, while in the House of Burgesses, or in the Convention that formed the Constitution, was never known to have delivered an argument, or made a motion, on any subject connected with the duties of his station, or showing any qualification for civil rule; that it was his capacity for military command alone that fitted him for presiding over the country.

[Mr. SMYTH said, he did not intend to say that military qualifications were necessary, but that his experience in commanding the army qualified him for President.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot agree with the gentleman, that General Washington's military experience was the source of his qualifications for the civil ruler. He was regarded every where as the first of the age. He showed his fitness for civil rule in the whole course of his life. His temperance, firmness, severe thought, his close observation on men and things, his love of order, evinced a capacity independent of military experience. The gentleman can find abundant evidence of the extraordinary qualifications of General Washington for civil rule, in the correspondence he kept up with the Congress during the whole time of the Revolutionary war, not only in reference to the Army under his command, but in reference to the situation of the People, and the country; showing an extensive research and intimate knowledge of mankind, and the secret springs of human action—a familiar acquaintance with the wants of the American People. This correspondence is filled with suggestions of his own mind, in relation to the trying exigencies of those times, fraught with wisdom, and with speculation on future events, which have stood the test of time, and, in fact, have now become a part of our history. Washington gave evidence of eminent capacity for a civil ruler in his state papers and public acts, which I should not suppose any one could forget. But, Sir, why pursue this inquiry? Who can believe it is necessary to adduce to an assembly of American citizens, evidence of the capacity of Washington? That evidence is found every where in the country—it has grown up with us—surrounds us—every one feels it—it is in our national existence. Again, we are told, what has also been repeatedly urged by others, here and elsewhere, that General Jackson is the second Washington! We have seen that he was opposed to the first Washington—that he condemned his measures, and felt no regret at his retirement. I would not resort to levity on such an occasion; but I will refer gentlemen to a resolution adopted not long since by an assembly of the People in one of the Northern States, as the best answer to the assertion: "that there is not now any second Washington, and it is not propable there will be very soon." If gentlemen will urge the claims of General Jackson, on the ground of his resemblance to Washington, let them undertake to run a parallel between them, founded either on their private or public acts, and they will at once find themselves at fault. If reference is had to the period of our Revolutionary struggle, where will an instance be found of Washington's disregard of the laws of the land, of his disregard of the orders, or refusal to obey, the civil authority? When did Washington issue a general order, that the officers under him should receive no orders from the Government, except they were transmitted through him, and were subjected to his will? When and where did Washington find it necessary to declare martial law, and suspend the writ of habeas corpus? When did Washington shew a disregard for the States, the sovereignties of this Union? The time when Washington commanded was certainly as trying as any during the late war. As extensive as may have been the disaffection to the cause of the country during the late war, as urgent as was the necessity of repressing it, no one will say there was less disaffection, or less urgent necessity for the employment of military means to keep it in subjection, during the war of the Revolution; yet, when did Washington think it expedient to use to the Governor of a State language like that used by General Jackson to Gov. Rabun, of Georgia: "when I am in the field, you have no authority to issue a military order!" I will not say this language indicates the possession of a monarchical feeling; but does it not show a controlling disposition to claim exclusive military prerogative, to exert none but military power—an extraordinary impatience under the control of the law, and the agents of the law? When did Washington find it expedient to disperse, at the point of the bayonet, the Legislature of a State? Yet, is it not an historical fact, that General Jackson, in that manner, dispersed the Legislature of Louisiana?

[Mr. LIVINGSTON asked leave to explain, as to that alleged historical fact. Mr. W. yielded the floor—Mr. LIVINGSTON was proceeding in his explanation, when

Mr. WHIPPLE called him to order—and was himself called to order.

The SPEAKER said, as the gentleman from Ohio had yielded the floor to the gentleman from Louisiana, he was proceeding in order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My object is to set the gentleman from Ohio right as to the fact, and I am surprised that any one should object to it. The gentleman had stated that it was an historical fact, that General Jackson had dispersed the Louisiana Legislature at the point of the bayonet. I must inform the gentleman that no such historical fact exists. The dispersion was by order of the Governor, not by General Jackson, and was occasioned by a mistake in transmitting and executing an order from General Jackson to the Governor. This was explained to the satisfaction of the Legislature, and resolutions were adopted exonerating General Jackson from the slightest blame. The mistake was made by the bearer of the message.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. I am obliged by the information of the gentleman. Having no opportunity since the gentleman from Virginia took his seat, to refer to documents, I speak altogether from memory, and shall not be surprised if I do occasionally fall into error. I would not accuse General Jackson, or any other man, wrongfully. I confess I am not, even now, able fully to understand this matter. I well recollect to have seen, not many months since, a letter published, as issued by General Jackson, in which he severely animadverted on the neglect or refusal of the presiding officer of the Senate of Louisiana, to prorogue that body, although he had no legal power to prorogue it; and, if my memory is accurate, accusing him of plotting treason against the liberties of the country.* Sir, I will dismiss this subject. It has * Since Mr. W.'s remarks were made in the House, he has been informed that the Legislature of Louisiana was turned out of doors at the point of the bayonet, and dispersed, on the 28th December, 1814, in pursuance of an order delivered by one of General Jackson's aids to Governor Claiborne, in the following words: "Tell Governor Claiborne it is my order that he disperse the Legislature, and blow them up in the air." Governor Claiborne, being under the command of General Jackson, obeyed him so far as to disperse the Legislature, but he did not "blow them up in the air." Subsequently this conduct of General Jackson was investigated in the Legislature, when he declared that he had given the order upon information that they were about capitulating with the enemy, and had annexed a qualification to the never been my wish to introduce it, but if gentlemen will obtrude it upon the House, they must expect to be met, and promptly, too.

The gentleman from Virginia denies that the Administration has, or is entitled to, the confidence of the People. He asserts that the President was elected contrary to the will of the People, and in violation of the spirit of the Constitution; and that the Administration is neither negative in its character nor good. What follows? The inevitable consequence is, that he asserts it to be bad. He holds it undeserving the confidence of the People.

[Mr. SMYTH said his observation was, that neither a negative nor a bad Administration ought to satisfy the People.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed. If the remark of the gentleman had any meaning, was it not made with intent to convey the idea that this Administration, having acquired power contrary to the Constitution, and the will of the People, was undeserving their confidence, because it was neither a negative nor a good Administration, but a bad one? How was the Constitution disregarded in the election of Mr. Adams? How was he the President of the members of this House, and not of the People? The People do not vote for President; they vote for agents, called electors, who vote for President under the provisions of the Constitution. In case these Electors fail to give a majority of votes for any one candidate, and in that case only, does the election devolve upon the agents of the States in that respect—the members of this House. The present President was elected in strict conformity with the provisions of the Constitution—provisions of an instrument which the People will continue to look to as the safeguard of their rights, notwithstanding the imputations cast upon it by the gentleman. By the operation of similar provisions, Mr. Jefferson was elected President. Was he not the President of the People, and entitled to their confidence? The gentleman will not deny it. Why, then, is not Mr. Adams the President of the People, and entitled to confidence? Does the change of men change the principle? But, sir, if Mr. Adams, constitutionally elected President, is, in the opinion of the gentleman, unworthy of confidence, on account of the manner of his election, let him take the alternative, and maintain, if he will, that no President is entitled to confidence unless he is elected contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. The gentleman, in my apprehension, has placed himself in this dilemma, and I am content he shall rest on either horn of it. If the constitutional mode of choosing a President does not meet his approbation, let him submit patiently, till the People alter it, and then hurl his denunciations upon those who violate it. Does the gentleman rely on the plurality of votes with which Gen. Jackson entered this House, as establishing his right to the Presidency? Sir, whatever the gentleman may think, I thank God that no man in this country has a right to the first office in the nation, either hereditary or divine, except he who has been constitutionally elected to that office. The gentleman may regret that it is so; but I rejoice at it. The gentleman has adduced a table, which he says was prepared by another person, with great care, and in which he confides, to prove that General Jackson was the choice of a majority of the People, and ought to have been President. Sir, I repeat, no one had a majority of votes, and, therefore, the choice has devolved on this House. I will presently show, that, if it was a sin to vote for Mr. Adams, who came before the House without a plurality of electoral votes, the gentleman himself has run deeper into it than I have. But, first, I will advert to the tables so triumphantly introduced. Without disparaging, in the slightest degree, the merits of the maker of the gentleman's table, I have a document in my hand, equally entitled to credit, that shows directly the reverse of his conclusions to be true. It is drawn up and published by a primary assembly of the very People interested in the question, in Washington county, Pennsylvania, and signed by the names of a number of gentlemen, who I personally know to be of the first respectability, headed by the highly distinguished President of their Court, Judge Baird. The table shows, in the aggregate, that Jackson got 99 electoral votes, Adams 84, Crawford 41, and Clay 37; but that, of the People's votes, given for Electors, Adams got 166,112, Jackson 153,733, Crawford 60,845, and Clay 52,667.* I recommend this table to the gentleman; but I will read the remarks of the address following the table:

"In some of the States, it will be observed, the electors were chosen by the Legislatures. The popular vote, therefore, is computed from an ascertained ratio of the actual votes, with the number of voters in the other States; they are distributed according to the proportion of electoral votes for each of the candidates. Thus, in Vermont, where Adams had all the votes in the Electoral College, we have given him the whole number of popular votes. In New York, they are divided according to the Electoral votes each received; and in South Carolina, where Jackson received all the Electoral votes, he is allowed all the popular votes. The result thus stated, shows, that, although Mr. Adams received 166,112 votes of the People, he had but 84 votes in the Electoral Colleges; while General Jackson, with only 153,733 popular votes, received the votes of 99 Electors. If the Electoral votes had been in accordance with the votes of the People, Mr. Adams would have had more than Jackson. Our opponents complain that Maryland and Illinois, in Congress, voted for Mr. Adams. Let us examine, from the data furnished, whether this was not exactly as the People wished. In Maryland, as the table shows, Mr. Adams had 14,632, and General Jackson order, which the Aid had neglected to give; but being satisfied that he had acted too hastily, he wrote to the Legislature on the subject, the 6th July, 1818, requesting an investigation, that he might punish his officers if they had misinformed him, and do justice to the Legislature, if they were innocent. The investigation took place, and it was found that there was no ground for suspicions entertained of the Legislature and that the order was founded on idle report.—See Proceedings before the Louisiana Legislature.—Also, Historical Memoir of the War in Louisiana.—Note by Mr. W.

Retrenchment.

14,523 popular votes. Now, upon pure Democratic principles, Mr. Adams ought to have got all the Electoral votes of that State; and if the Electors had been chosen, as in Pennsylvania, by a General Ticket, he would have had them. But, in the division of Districts, it happened that General Jackson, with a less number of popular votes, obtained seven Electoral votes. If Mr. Adams had obtained them, the result would have been 92 each. In Illinois, also, Mr. Adams had 1,541, and General Jackson only 1,272 votes of the People. Upon the same principle, Adams, therefore, ought to have had the Electoral votes of that State; yet Jackson got two and he only one. If we take these two from the General and add them to Mr. Adams, it would then stand thus: Adams 94, Jackson 90.

"There is another fact that appears from this table, that ought not to be overlooked. In the Southern States, where General Jackson received his majorities, the slave population is represented in the proportion of five to three whites. Electors were chosen accordingly. Five slaves, therefore, has as much political power as three free whites, in the Eastern and Middle States. It is evident, therefore, that Mr. Adams had, in truth, a very large plurality of the free voters of the United States."

This statement is followed by another table, illustrating the position advanced, which I will not detain you to read, but will content myself with reading the comments of the address upon it.

"From the above table it will appear that, from the slave-holding States, Jackson received forty-four and Adams but four Electoral votes. The Senatorial Representation is not taken into account, as it would not affect the calculation either way. It will also appear, that, of pure slave votes, Jackson received nearly eleven, and Adams one only. Now, take the result as we have shown it would have been, if Maryland and Illinois had gone entirely for Adams, according to the popular vote, viz: ninety-four for Adams and ninety for Jackson. Extinguish the slave vote altogether, which would subtract, in whole numbers, ten from Jackson and one from Adams, it would then stand, Adams 93, and Jackson 80 only. Thus, in every point of view, it is clear, if the voice of the greater number is to be an indication, that Adams was the choice of the free People of the United States; and the main argument of our opponents falls to the ground."

Sir, said Mr. WRIGHT, I read these extracts with no design of questioning the right of the People of the slave-holding States to that portion of political power the Constitution distributes to them. I would draw no invidious comparisons. I read as a conclusive refutation of the position taken by the gentleman from Virginia. I did not understand him, I could not understand him, as claiming to include among those People, whose will, expressed by their votes, was to be regarded in the choice of President, any other than the free People of the United States. If I have erred in this, the gentleman can correct me. Away, then, with the allegation, that Mr. Adams was chosen President, contrary to the Constitution, or against the will of a majority of the People. Of the will of the free People, Mr. Adams had a majority of their votes in his favor. If those who voted for Mr. Adams in this House are to be put down as traitors to the interest of the People, as so regardless of the obligations of the Constitution, because another had a greater number of Electoral votes, what shall be said of those who voted for Mr. Crawford, having a far less number of votes? The gentleman from Virginia, and myself, were both here, at the Presidential election—he voted for Mr. Crawford who had forty-one votes, I voted for Mr. Adams, who had eighty-four votes; am I a traitor to the People and the Constitution, and is he faithful to both?

[Mr. SMYTH said, he referred to those who did not vote according to the opinions of their States. He voted for

Mr. Crawford, because Virginia was in favor of Mr. Crawford.]

Mr. WRIGHT. The explanation of the gentleman does not affect my argument. Those who voted for Mr. Adams are accused of violating the spirit of the Constitution and thwarting the will of the People to an extent, that the example is so dangerous to their liberties, as to make it meritorious to pull down—not those who voted—but the Chief Magistrate for whom they voted, and the Cabinet he had drawn around him, without reference to their acts. The gentleman says, the Representatives of five States voted against the will of their constituents. Where is the proof? I represent a portion of the People of one of the five States referred to. The charge has been reiterated, time and again, that the vote of those States was due to General Jackson, as of right.

[Mr. SMYTH said, he did not intend to include Ohio.] Mr. WRIGHT. I am glad to hear it. I so understood the gentleman. But, whether he intended to include that State or not, the charge has been made and reiterated, and my colleagues and myself, who voted for Mr. Adams, have been held up as odious; the execration of the People has been invoked upon us; our names have been strung up in the newspapers in black lists, and served up as a standing dish, from the Presidential election, until the next Congressional election. We submitted our conduct to the proper tribunal, the People, our constituents; and, notwithstanding the most unprecedented efforts of the party in Opposition, in the State and out, all who were candidates except one, was re-elected—and that one was defeated on other grounds than his vote; and he is now succeeded by a friend of the Administration here. Our conduct has received the sanction of the People. If I have not again mistaken the gentleman, one of the five States alluded to was Maryland. I have already shewn that the vote of that State in Congress had been given in accordance with the expressed will of a majority of the People of that State. I do not know what other States are alluded to.

[Mr. SMYTH said, he alluded to Maryland, North Carolina, Louisiana, Illinois, and Missouri.]

Mr. WRIGHT. The remarks I have just made as to Maryland, apply equally to Illinois. In Louisiana the People have re-elected those members who voted for Mr. Adams. In Missouri they have elected a friend of the Administration; and I am not aware of any member from North Carolina who has lost his election on account of his vote for Mr. Crawford. If the People, therefore, whose will is alleged to have been betrayed, are admitted to know their own will, their testimony is in evidence against the gentleman, and he has wholly failed to establish his position. The gentleman tells us, that, if the votes of these five States had been given as the People wished, General Jackson would have been the President. True, he was not able, with those States, to make out but twelve votes for General Jackson, and it required thirteen votes to elect; but he assures us there can be no doubt but some other State would have fallen in, and secured his election! This is certainly a convenient method of proving the assertion—there can be no doubt some other State would have fallen in! Is it not as free from doubt, that some other State would have fallen into Mr. Adams's scale, as into that of General Jackson? Would not Virginia, at that time, have preferred Adams next after Crawford? Will the gentleman dispute it? Would not North Carolina and Georgia have preferred Mr. Adams to General Jackson? I inquire as to the then state of opinion and feeling in those States. Who, that was here, and conversant with what was passing, will dispute it? I think it clear, that, if General Jackson had received the votes of the five States named, still he could not have been elected President. All the declamation we hear upon that subject is worse than idle. It is calculated, in its natural tendency, to deceive the People. I will not say gentlemen so intend, but such is the natural consequence of the course pursued. The facts on which the gentleman from Virginia has grounded his proclamation against the President and his cabinet, in existing contrary to the will of the People, and of being consequently unworthy of confidence, have failed him. He may himself essay to cross the line in pursuit of his enemy, or cast a paper shot across it into the enemy's territory; but he must find the fortune of war against him; he will be unable to stimulate his men to follow his example, and be compelled to desist. The gentleman again says Mr. Adams is not entitled to confidence, because he was not taken up by the People—General Jackson was the candidate of the People. I had thought General Jackson had been nominated by the Legislature of Tennessee. I believe Mr. Adams had also been nominated by a State Legislature. Both had been nominated by Legislative bodies, and both also by the People, in their primary assemblies. Both, then, were candidates of States, and both were alike candidates of the People—both had been voted for by States, and also by the People. But why, sir, are such arguments urged here? They are not well suited to the place or occasion.

The gentleman insists that Mr. Adams is undeserving the confidence of the People, because he voted against the acquisition of Louisiana. We are told by the gentleman we shall not inquire into any abuses in the Government that may have occurred before the year 1824. Yet gentlemen constantly rely on transactions of Mr. Adams and the Administration long anterior to that period. The fairness of this course is with themselves to settle. But, sir, the cession of Louisiana was obtained before Mr. Adams took his seat in the Senate. He did not vote against the acquisition. At a subsequent period, on the question of extending the laws of the Union over the Territory, without the original limits of the United States, he voted in the negative. On that question he had doubts of the constitutional power of Congress—doubts, which, I have heretofore stated, he entertained in common with Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison.

[Mr. SMYTH. I said he voted against taking possession of Louisiana.

Mr. WRIGHT. How against taking possession, by a vote of the Senate? My memory does not enable me to solve the inquiry; and I think it will puzzle the gentleman to find such a vote.

Mr. SMYTH asked to explain, and refer to the vote. He referred to the Journal of the Senate of 26th October, 1803, in which Mr. Adams voted in a minority of six against the bill to authorize the President to take possession of Louisiana.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I was in error, as to that point, and the gentleman has, by his correction, afforded me an opportunity to acknowledge and correct it. I spoke on this subject altogether from memory, having had no opportunity to refer to documents. But, sir, I am now advised that this vote was given upon the doubts I have suggested, and upon objections to the form of the bill. I repeat, that Mr. Adams was not unfriendly to the acquisition of Louisiana; and after Congress had put a construction upon the Constitution, in reference to the doubts which had been first suggested by Mr. Jefferson in a circular letter on the subject, and after that construction had been acquiesced in by the People of the States and the new Territory, Mr. Adams voted with the friends of Mr. Jefferson. He certainly did not, as the gentleman asserts, vote against every measure concerning that Territory. I will refer the gentleman to the same Journal from which he has read, where he will find that Mr. Adams voted in the affirmative on the passage of the bill creating stock to carry into execution the treaty of session, and providing for the payment of the purchase money, on the 3d November, 1803. I am informed, Sir, that Mr. Adams was one of the warmest advocates for the acquisition of Louisiana, and that he not only supported this bill, but made an able and eloquent speech in the Senate in favor of it.*

The gentleman is for hunting Mr. Adams down, because, he says, at Ghent, he proposed and attempted to surrender the right to navigate the Mississippi river to the enemy. Sir, I reside upon one of the main tributaries of that mighty river, and, in common with my constituents, feel immediately and deeply interested in that question. Any attempt to take from the Western People their right to the navigation of that river, would be promptly met and firmly repelled; yet, jealous as they are of their rights, and ready as they always have been to protect and defend them, the transactions at Ghent have not been viewed by them as obnoxious to censure, on the ground assumed by the gentleman from Virginia. Whatever right or claim the British have to the navigation of that river, will be found recognized in the treaties and laws of the country, long before the mission to Ghent was ever thought of. The right was claimed before we established our independence. It was expressly recognized in the treaty of peace of 1782, and was in force at * Mr. Adams first took his seat in the Senate the day after the Louisiana Treaty was ratified.

The 26th Oct. 1803, he voted against the bill to take possession of Louisiana, because he thought the 2d section unconstitutional. It is in these words: "And be it further enacted, That, until the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion." The reader is asked to reflect on the extent and consequences of the power herein conferred on the President, and then open the Constitution, and point out the section which authorizes Congress to confer upon the President such tremendous power. It can only be found in construction. What would be said if Congress were now to propose to confer such power on President Adams?—the powers of the King of Spain or France, or of a Viceroy?

The other acts of the same session, extending the laws of the United States over the people of Louisiana, were opposed by Mr. Adams, because they assumed to exercise powers which had not been granted to Congress itself; of powers reserved by the People of the United States to themselves; and of powers inherent, by natural right, in the people of Louisiana. The union of the two people required the express and formal consent of both. He thought the United States had no constitutional right to force their laws upon the people of Louisiana, who had no voice in making them, without their consent. He thought the sense of the people, both of the United States and of Louisiana, should be taken—of the first, by an amendment of the Constitution, which he proposed to raise a committee to bring in; and of the last, by taking the votes of the people of Louisiana. He had no doubt of the consent of both, and he thought such a course "would serve as a landmark of correct principles for future times, as a memorial of homage to the fundamental principles of civil society, to the primitive sovereignty of the People, and the unalienable rights of man." Congress determined otherwise, and so put a construction on the Constitution, which, being acquiesced in by the People of the United States and of Louisiana, was also acquiesced in by Mr. Adams, and he ever after acted on that construction.

Mr. Adams was in favor of the acquisition of Louisiana, and of annexing it to the Union, though he differed with the majority as to the means to be employed in effecting the desired object. On the 3d Nov. 1803, he voted for the bill creating stock to complete the purchase, supposing the treaty-making power fully adequate to effect the acquisition, although he entertained doubts of the authority, in the manner proposed, to govern the people acquired, without their consent. On this occasion he made a speech, which is reported in the National Intelligencer, of the 26th Nov. 1803, in which he says: "I am extremely solicitous that every title of the engagements on our part, in these Conventions, should be performed with the most scrupulous good faith." "Such is the public favor attending the transaction which commenced by the negotiation of this treaty, and which I hope will terminate in our full, undisturbed, and undisputed possession of the ceded territory, that I firmly believe, if an amendment to the Constitution, simply sufficient for the accomplishment of every thing we have contracted, shall be proposed, as I think it ought, it will be adopted by every State in the Union." "I trust they [our stipulations] will be performed, and I will cheerfully lend my hand to every act necessary for the purpose; for I consider the object as of the highest importance to us; and the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Breckenridge) himself, who has displayed, with so much eloquence, the immense importance to this Union, of the possession of the ceded territory, cannot carry his ideas on that subject further than I do."—See National Intelligencer, 1803-4, the Journal of the Senate, and Mr. Adams's letter in reply to Hon. Alexander Smyth, published in 1833.—Note by Mr. W.

the commencement of the late war.* The American commission at Ghent assumed the ground, under the instructions of the Government, with Mr. Madison at its head, that the occurrence of war had not abrogated the rights of our country under that treaty—which was a treaty of Independence, an acknowledgement of our right to enter into the family of nations. The status ante bellum—the state of things before the war—is well known to have been the basis of that negotiation. The proposition to which the gentleman probably alludes, was one submitted on that basis, and made to countervail one submitted by the British commission. It had its effect. But, sir, that proposition, good or bad, is not chargeable to Mr. Adams—he neither drew nor submitted it. It was drawn by Mr. Gallatin. The treaty was finally concluded without any provision on that subject; and this important right, which the gentleman gratuitously supposes Mr. Adams treacherously proposed to surrender to the enemy, remains secured to the British by the provisions of the treaty of Independence, and as they have enjoyed it ever since! Yet what single individual living on that river, or navigating its waters, has been conscious of its existence, or that he has been deprived of any right?—The gentleman evinced his strong desire to know all the secret negotiations, in the right season, and in the day time, in reference to that subject. He has been in pursuit of this information, I believe, some years, and, if he has fallen short of its attainment, I know not who can aid him; but I will hazard the assertion, that neither Mr. Adams, nor any member of his cabinet, have any knowledge on the subject they wish to conceal. The clamor raised in relation to this matter, is not raised by the People, but by politicians, who wish to obtain and wield the power and patronage of the Government.

The gentleman from Virginia has made many other accusations against Mr. Adams. I will not occupy the time necessary to follow him through the whole list, as many of them are of a character requiring no refutation before an intelligent People. One of these charges is, that Mr. Adams was one of three who proposed a bill in the Senate for suspending the writ of habeas corpus. I will not canvass the merits of that proposition. The gentleman did not show how the proposing this bill disqualified Mr. Adams for the Presidency; that he has left for conjecture. It seems to me, that, if the submitting to the deliberation of Congress, a proposition to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, be an unpardonable sin in Mr. Adams, and calling for his abandonment and disgrace; if this proposition, which was never carried into effect, is calculated to ruin his hopes; that the claims of Gen. Jackson, the gentleman's own candidate, cannot be promoted by being placed in contrast. He, contrary to law, or certainly without its express aid, actually suspended that writ, I believe, in more instances than one, and employed military coercion to control the judicial functionaries, who had, or were about to grant its privileges; and moreover used towards one judge, at least, violent denunciatory words, and words of gross personal abuse.

The gentleman from Virginia had referred to the Military Academy at West Point. All was wrong there too. It is alleged to be an aristocratic institution, and to have been diverted from its original object. None but the sons of the rich and powerful, in his view, were educated there; its benefits were withheld from the poor. In accordance with Mr. Adams's political opinions, this institution was conducted to establish a privileged order. The gentleman feelingly deprecates the prevalence of aristocratic opinions and privileged orders, as dangerous to liberty. It has been repeatedly shown, during this debate, that the gentleman's opinions of this school are unfounded. Its benefits have not been limited to the rich; but have been, as they should be under our Government, extended alike to the poor and the rich. The science acquired there pervades all ranks and classes in society, and, being diffused throughout the country, forms the capital upon which it can safely draw in time of need. All contribute to its support, and all participate in its benefits. Appointments to that institution are made from every part of the country, upon the basis of the Representation from each State in Congress. The gentleman suggested a remedy for this evil; one that excited my special wonder, although in keeping with the modern claims for military predominance. His indignation was roused to its highest pitch, against the aristocracy of the country, and its privileged orders in the Military Academy, and he proposed that it be open only to the sons of officers of the army! Is this pure Republicanism, in the opinion of the gentleman? We will have no aristocracy—no privileged order—but none shall enjoy the privileges of the Military Academy—none shall hereafter be eligible to receive commissions in the army, but the sons of officers—the sons of military officers are to constitute an order with an hereditary right to public education and military command! Is this the Opposition Republican remedy for the privileged orders of the present Military Academy? Is the maxim of the Constitution, which subjects the military to the civil power to be reversed, and the post of honor and danger alone to be opened to the sons of military officers?

[Mr. SMYTH stated, he had said the sons of deceased military officers.]

Mr. WRIGHT. That does not, in any way, affect my argument. The principle is the same, whether the officer be dead or alive. None but the sons of officers are to be admitted into the Academy. The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are free and equal; but now, the sons of soldiers, the bone and muscle of your armies, who fight your battles, and without whom officers would be useless, are to be excluded—they are not to be privileged—they are not to be entitled to any portion of the gentleman's regard, or to the protection of the country. The sons of farmers, of mechanics, of statesmen, who have wasted their lives in the public service, of soldiers who have fought its battles—all these are to stand aside, to make way for this new, and exclusively privileged order—the sons of Officers in the Army! Sir, I will not deprive the gentleman of any portion of the merit arising from the possession of such Republicanism—he may enjoy the whole of it—and I think I do not mistake the temper of the American People, in saying they will be warned by the promulgation of such alarming doctrines, and awakened to increased exertions to arrest their progress, and preserve our institutions against their influence. I intend the gentleman no disrespect, but I think the remedy he proposes for the Military Academy, if resorted to, would impel us with astonishing rapidity into a military despotism—a calamity which I pray God to avert from my country. Sir, I will now leave the gentleman from Virginia, and proceed with the subjects I intended to remark upon before he addressed the House.

The gentleman from Tennessee, on the opposite side of the House, [Mr. BELL] delighted me and the House, with the effort he made in this discussion—an effort evidencing in him, the possession of extraordinary intellectual faculties, and powers of eloquence rarely to be met with, accompanied with good feelings, highly commendable on all occasions, and the more commendable in those engaged in political warfare. But I think, sir, some of the remarks he was pleased to make, in relation to myself, were not in keeping with the general tenor of his observations. I do not allude to the compliment he paid me, though I confess I thought it rather a left-handed

ne. He said I invoked, with more art than he had ever before witnessed, abuse upon the Administration, and had striven to provoke from its opponents charges of corruption. I am sure, sir, if the gentleman had listened to what I said, he would have spared these remarks. I invoked no abuse of the Administration; I sought not to provoke any one opposed to it, to charge it with corruption and profligacy. I never believed it obnoxious to such a charge: but I did invoke, and I do now invoke, full and free examination and inquiry into the acts of its members, into their abuses of power. I courted, and I now court, an investigation of facts connected with their conduct, which I thought and still think will exonerate them from the abuse that had been heaped upon them; and I urged gentlemen, who persisted in pouring out abuse upon those officers, to abandon general charges, and resort to something specific that could be met. I do not suppose the gentleman misinterpreted me purposely; I have for him a feeling of a different character. The gentleman said, moreover, that, until this invocation to abuse on the Administration, no one had made any attack on the individuals composing it. The gentleman could not have attended to the course of the debate; to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, who introduced the proposition [Mr. CHILTON]; to those made by the two gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. FLOYD]; to those of the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania Messrs. INGHAM and BUCHANAN; to those of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MITCHELL]; to those of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL]; and those of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON]—all of which preceded mine. A reference to the course of the debate, sir, I think, satisfy the gentleman, that I am not obnoxious to the charge thrown upon me. I have never provoked a discussion of this kind, although it has fallen to my lot to engage in several in defending the cause I support. The gentleman said, also, as I understood him, that I had introduced the Tariff into this debate, and he expressed a wish, with peculiar emphasis, that no friend of his country would endeavor to connect that subject with the Presidential election. If the gentleman intended the House should understand that my remarks on that subject evidenced hostility to the institutions of the country, or a desire to connect the Tariff with the Presidential question, I repel the imputation. I did not introduce that subject into debate—it was introduced by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOYD] near the gentleman from Tennessee, and I only alluded to it in reply. I would avoid making the connexion deprecated by the gentleman, and should he hereafter see any attempt to connect those subjects, I hope he will unite with me in preventing its execution. The gentleman went still one step farther, and, assuming that the friends of the Administration were game run down, he entreated his friends to forbearance, and wound his horn to call off the hounds. The gentleman had better wait a little—he is too fast. Is he quite sure the game is run down? I think it is far from that—it is not, and will not be, run down. He can set his pack in motion again, as soon as he pleases; but I beg him to spare us his pity, at least until we ask it. When we cry craven, then let him call off his hounds, and be magnanimous—not before. The gentleman, with much force, invoked both sides to forbear personal irritating remarks and allusions, yet perhaps, in the next sentence, he employs the potent party catch words, “safe precedents,” of most significant meaning in these times—showing in himself how much easier it is to give good advice than to follow it.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE] brought into the debate rather more than his usual zeal. He wove together, with great skill and adroitness, Auden's scalp, National roads, Indian tours, London, Tacubaya, and Guatemala cards, Hartford Convention, Leece coats, the Jackson party, and Sons of Royalty, making a substantial opposition web, of entirely new materials, which I will not attempt to unravel. The efforts shewed him friendly to domestic manufactures, and experienced in the fabrication of a new article, without the aid of a protecting duty—the raw material for which he could speak into existence at pleasure. There are but two of the many allusions made by the gentleman to which I intend to make any reply: the imputation upon the Secretary of State in relation to the distribution of the laws, and those upon the Secretary of War, for the manner of disbursing the appropriation to improve the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. The gentleman cannot be ignorant that a law of the United States, passed many years ago, directed the Secretary of State, within a given period after the close of each session of Congress, to have their acts printed and distributed to each State and Territory of the Union. The distribution was formerly made through the Post Office Department, free of expense to Government; but, I think early in the session before the last, the Postmaster General informed the Secretary the laws could no longer be distributed in that way, because their great bulk delayed and injured the regular mail.* The law required the Secretary to distribute the acts of Congress; that duty he was bound to perform; a resort to the usual channel of distribution was declared by the officer having control over it injurious to the public interest—what was the Secretary to do? Estimates of the expense of a different mode were communicated to Congress, and appropriations made, and he did just what his duty required of him. No complaint is made by the gentleman that the Secretary has not faithfully performed his duty, or that he has employed unfaithful agents; yet he is blamed for performing that duty. Would the gentleman have the distribution again made through the medium of the Post Office? He should require the Postmaster General to perform that duty. It would be much more appropriately assigned to that Department, than to the Department of State, and I will warrant the duty is one of which the Secretary of State would gladly be relieved.

The gentleman from Kentucky has also alluded to the appropriations made to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi, and unhesitatingly charges the Administration with profligacy, in employing two agents in expending the money. Sir, Congress, in May, 1824, appropriated $75,000 for removing the snags, planters, and sawyers, in the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and to make an experiment to improve the navigation of the Ohio over one or two of the sand bars below the falls. Last Winter, a law was passed, appropriating 30,000 dollars to improve the navigation of the Ohio river alone, and in other re-

* It is understood that the first practice under the law requiring a distribution of the acts of Congress, was the same as now practised, which was followed by a distribution through the Post Office Department, that was practised for several years. In the Winter of 1824-5, and in the Spring of 1826, the Postmaster General informed the Secretary of State of the difficulties attending that mode of distribution, and suggested a change; in consequence of which, estimates were reported to the House, and appropriations made for the increased expenses of distribution. The following extract of a letter from Mr. McLean will put this matter in its true light:

“I informed the Secretary of State that the mail had increased so much, in bulk and weight, and for several months would be so much crowded with the documents which had been ordered to be published, that, to distribute the laws through it, as had been the practice some years past, would be extremely inconvenient, and injurious to the public; and I suggested the propriety of his adopting some other plan to distribute them. On the Southern and Western routes, the mail, at that time, weighed often from two to three thousand pounds, and I was apprehensive that, if the laws were added to the documents which would be in the course of distribution during the Summer, that the transportation of it would not only be retarded on some of the most important routes, but that letters would be liable to injury by its great weight and consequent friction.

“The Secretary afterwards informed me, that, in consequence of my suggestion, he should forward in the mail only a few copies, to the United States' officers in each State, and should make arrangement to distribute the balance of them through his own Department.

spects than the removal of the snags, &c. The one law had an object entirely different from, and having no connexion with, the other. The objects of the laws differing, and the theatre for expenditures being variant, it is obvious that two sets of agents were required. The Administration were bound to appoint two, and they did so. Does blame attach to them? Were the appointments bad ones?

[Mr. WICKLIFFE explained. He said, that, under the appropriation for clearing out the Ohio and Mississippi, the Administration appointed a Superintendent and Assistant, at six dollars per day, and under the last appropriation, which he said was connected with the improvement of the Ohio, at the Grand Chain, &c. the power had been exercised to appoint a new Superintendent, whom he did not know. He understood he had made large preparations last Spring for a splendid trip, but little or nothing had been done.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Under the act of May, 1824, appropriating the 75,000 dollars, the former Secretary of War offered that expenditure on a contract, and submitted the execution of the contract to the supervision of a Captain Babcock, of the corps of Engineers, I believe.—They had not proceeded far, before it was found the contractor and engineer were running counter to the contract and the interest of the Government, and the provisions of the law—the work was stopped—the captain of Engineers was arrested, and brought before a Court Martial for trial. After considerable delay, the Executive appointed Captain Shreve, who I believe now holds the appointment.

[Mr. WICKLIFFE said the appointment had been once given to a gentleman in Kentucky, now dead.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman; I had forgotten that appointment. The duties of the superintendent were specific, but mostly connected with the Mississippi River. The appropriation of last Winter was solely for the Ohio river, and looked to its general improvement, along its whole line from Pittsburg to the Mississippi. It was not limited to operations below the falls, where all the operations under the former appropriations, except the removal of snags, &c. were confined, and to experiments upon the sand bars. The law devolved the duty upon the Executive of expending this money. How was it to be expended? Will the gentleman from Kentucky say, it was expected the Secretary of War should leave his official duties here, and superintend the expenditure of this money? The power to appoint an agent, he says, was inferred—he did not say usurped, though his remarks looked that way. Sir, what was the Secretary to do? He could not attend to discharge this duty in person. Was he to neglect it? No one will pretend so. What then was he to do? The only alternative was, to select the proper agent to execute the law. The gentleman seems to think the duty should have been conferred on Captain Shreve. Why, I am unable to see. I presume he had no right to the appointment. Nay, such an appointment would have been manifestly improper. Had he received the second appointment, he could not have performed its duties without neglecting those of his first appointment. It was not advisable to postpone the execution of the second law, until the first was completely executed. I will not question Captain Shreve's competence to discharge the duties incident to the execution of either law, but he had not power to perform, at the same time, the duties of both, which might require his personal attendance, in places one thousand miles distant from each other. The Secretary of War appointed as agent a Mr. Courtney, of Alleghany County, Pennsylvania, not an obscure, unknown man, as the gentleman sneeringly supposed, but a respectable citizen, one who had been united several years since by the Government of Pennsylvania in a commission of office, to expend an appropriation made by that State to improve the navigation of the same river. He was, therefore, not without experience, although the gentleman had never heard of him. The confidence reposed in him by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in reference to similar service, I think was entitled to as much respect by the Secretary of War, as the unknown circumstance, now alleged, that the gentleman from Kentucky had never heard of him. Without charging this officer with any dereliction of duty, his selection is urged against the Administration, as evidence of usurpation, of profligacy, and extravagance? This is really one of the curiosities of the times, for the discovery of which the gentleman from Kentucky should have credit. It would be a waste of time to say more on this point. I had intended to notice the remarks of the gentleman in relation to the extravagant expenditures of the Administration in holding Indian treaties, and for the journeys of the clerk connected with Indian affairs. Sir, I have not a very high opinion of the individual alluded to. I may be prejudiced against him, but I do not think very highly of him. It is not my purpose to defend him, but barely to say, that I am informed the gentleman from Kentucky has fallen into gross error as to the amount expended either in holding the treaties, or performing the journeys alluded to.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGRAM] in the remarks he made, yesterday, said, with an emphasis and manner that distinguish him, that one member of the cabinet had said, about the time of the election for President, in reference to the want of popularity in the individual selected, "give us the patronage, and we will make ourselves popular." Where is the evidence to sustain this accusation? There is none. I do not believe a word of it. The gentleman, himself, pretends to no proof, except that found in the party publications of the day. The gentleman says, further, that the Administration got the power, and the individuals composing it then entered into a Holy Alliance against virtue and intelligence; got money to control the press—to reward venal writers for traducing innocent females! The gentleman exhibited, on this occasion, an over zeal, little creditable to his cause or this place. If the members of the Administration have entered into a Holy Alliance of this character, the People should know it. I demand the proof. Who were the parties to this Holy Alliance? When and where was it formed? Where is the field of its operations? When accusations of this enormity are urged in this place against those entrusted with the Administration of our Government: those enjoying the confidence of the People; the ornaments of the age we live in—the cause of the country, the character of our public men, the permanence of our institutions, the friends of freedom throughout the world, all unite in the call for proof; and I tell the gentleman, the call is not answered by reference to the party newspaper libels of the day. Something more is necessary to sustain such a charge. Stronger evidence is required. We are charged with introducing personalities into this debate; but, I believe, without foundation, in any one instance. Do gentlemen suppose it evidences a decorous regard for order and decency, to rise here, and fulminate anathemas against the officers of Government, for entering into a holy alliance against virtue and intelligence, for corrupting the press, and hiring venal wretches to traduce female character? Are we to sit quiet under such imputations? Are we to rest satisfied under the assurance that they are based on common newspaper libels? I have heard of combinations, or, if the gentleman prefers, a holy alliance of fragments of adverse political parties, against the virtue and intelligence of the People, to induce them to pull down the present Administration, and transfer the power and patronage of the Government from them to the Allies; I have heard of attempts to "improve the condition of the Press;" of subscriptions of large sums of money to control its action; and we all heard with horror my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] read an extract from a pamphlet published by—I will not say a “venal wretch”—traducing the character of the wife of our Chief Magistrate; but, thank God, neither have connexion with any member of the Administration. If the gentleman would crown his benevolent efforts with an immediate and abundant harvest, his prospects of success would, doubtless, improve, if he pursued his inquiries among the combined force, opposed to the Administration.

Sir, just as the question was about to be taken, yesterday, the gentleman from Pennsylvania threw himself before the House, and tauntingly accused the friends of the Administration with “backing out,” and seeking a “cloak” to cover us, and to cover the iniquities and enormities of the Administration, because we wished the inquiry to be carried back to 1791, to a period embracing former Administrations. Not one half hour before, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] in an eloquent appeal to the House, endeavored to show that the Administration was unworthy of confidence, because it had not pursued the example of the Administrations of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. These charges of extravagance and profligacy, can only be made out by comparison. One gentleman contrasts the course of this Administration with that of former ones, and another gentleman, on the same side, when we seek, in order to ascertain if the contrast is well founded, to inquire what the former ones did, charges us with seeking for a cloak to cover our enormities! Admirable consistency this! The Administration is to be pulled down for deviating from these worthy examples, and yet, when we ask to be informed in what particular the Administration has deviated, the door is to be abruptly shut, not a ray of light is to be shed upon the inquiry. Sir, gentlemen may pursue their own course; but such injustice is too palpable to escape the reprobation of an intelligent community. It will require a broad cloak to shield those who refuse so plain an act of justice from the indignation of the People.

The gentleman, I believe, adverted to the appointment, by the present Administration, of members of Congress, to office—I am sure the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] did—and relied upon the instances that have taken place, to fix upon the Administration the charge of corruption. Some gentlemen have referred to the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, as the only perfect model for imitation. I admire its purity. He was chosen by this House, as was Mr. Adams. I will not rely on my memory, in reference to the course Mr. Jefferson adopted towards members that voted for him, and exerted themselves to ensure his election; but I will read some extracts from a debate in this House, in 1802, on the repeal of the Judiciary, connected with this subject. They are from one whose opinions will now be received, as carrying with them great authority—from the remarks of one, then a member of this House, from the State of Delaware, now no more, whose talents, integrity, virtue, and eloquence, none will question—I mean the late James A. Bayard. In debate, on the 20th February, 1802, he said:

“The case, sir, to which I refer, carries me once more to the scene of the Presidential election. I should not have introduced it into this debate, had it not been called up by the honorable gentleman from Virginia. In that scene, I had my part; it was a part not barren of incident, and which has left an impression which cannot easily depart from my recollection. I know who were rendered important characters, either from the possession of personal means, or from the accident of political situation. And now, sir, let me ask the honorable member what his reflections and belief will be, when he observes that every man, on whose vote the event of the election hung, has since been distinguished by Presidential favor? I fear, sir, I shall violate the decorum of Parliamentary proceeding, in mentioning names; but I hope the example which has been set me, will be admitted as an excuse. Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, was not a member of the House, but he was one of the most active, efficient, and successful promoters of the present Chief Magistrate. It was well ascertained that the votes of South Carolina were to turn the equal balance of the scales. The zeal and industry of Mr. Pinckney had no bounds. The doubtful politics of South Carolina were decided, and her votes cast into the scale of Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Pinckney has since been appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Madrid; an appointment as high and honorable as any within the gift of the Executive. I will not deny that this preferment is the reward of talents and services, although, sir, I have never yet heard of the talents or services of Mr. Charles Pinckney. In the House of Representatives, I know what was the value of the vote of Mr. Claiborne, of Tennessee. The vote of a State was in his hands. Mr. Claiborne has since been raised to the high dignity of Governor of the Mississippi Territory. I know how great, and how greatly felt, was the importance of the vote of Mr. Linn, of New Jersey. The delegation of the State consists of five members. Two of the delegation were decidedly for Mr. Jefferson; two were decidedly for Mr. Burr. Mr. Linn was considered as inclining to one side, but still doubtful. Both parties looked up to him for the vote of New Jersey. He gave it to Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Linn has since had the profitable office of Supervisor of his District conferred upon him.” Again, he says, “I shall add to the catalogue but the name of one more gentleman, Mr. Edward Livingston, of New York. I knew well, full well I knew, the consequence of this gentleman. His means were not united to his own vote; nay, I always considered more than the vote of New York, within his power. Mr. Livingston has been made Attorney for the District of New York; the road of preferment has been opened to him, and his brother has been raised to the distinguished place of Minister Plenipotentiary to the French Republic. This catalogue might be swelled to a much greater magnitude; but, I fear, Mr. Chairman, were I to proceed farther, it might be supposed that I myself harbored the uncharitable suspicions of the Chief Magistrate, and of the purity of the gentlemen whom he thought proper to promote, which it is my design alone to banish from the mind of the honorable gentleman from Virginia.” Again, he says—“The present Executive, leaving scarcely any exception, has appointed to office, or has by accident indirectly gratified, every man who had any distinguished means in the competition for the Presidential office, of deciding the election in his favor. Yet, sir, all this furnishes too feeble a presumption to warrant me to express a suspicion of the integrity of a great officer, or of the probability of honorable men, in the discharge of the high functions which they had derived from the confidence of their country.”

Sir, I will not detain you while I read further. I commend the example of him from [whose remarks I have read to gentlemen, as worthy to be followed. But, if the Administration of Mr. Jefferson is put forth as the only example worthy of imitation—and I admit its worth—let gentlemen apply the remarks I have read to the charges now made against the present Chief Magistrate. If the appointment of Mr. Pinckney, Minister abroad; the appointment of Mr. Claiborne, Governor; of Mr. Linn, Supervisor; of Mr. Livingston, who wielded more than his own vote, to the office of District Attorney; and sending his brother Minister to France; be no evidence of corruption in Mr. Jefferson, or of themselves, I ask,

H. or R.]

Retrenchment.

[FEB. 6, 1828.]

with what face it can be claimed, that any appointment of the present President, from members of Congress, is evidence of corruption in him or them? The same rule should be applied to both. Mr. Jefferson appointed many more members of Congress to office than the present President has. I do believe, sir, that men of pure patriotism, of a more sincere love of country, are not to be found, than the members of the Administration, and those gentlemen on this floor, [excluding myself from the number] who engaged in electing him. Shall it then be said, that charges of corruption, founded on the circumstances attending the election of Mr. Jefferson, stronger than any connected with the election of Mr. Adams, are to be scouted as unfounded and malignant, while in the case of Mr. Adams, they are to be received as conclusive proof?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has told you he had no knowledge or belief in the charge of bargain and intrigue, as connected with the Presidential election.

[Mr. BUCHANAN explained. He thought he had been sufficiently explicit in what he said, and in the explanations he had given, and particularly to the gentleman from New Hampshire, a short time since, not to be misunderstood. He had said that, as to all knowledge of any thing improper, or any bargain, in the last Presidential Election, he disclaimed it; he knew nothing about it. He would not impute corruption, but had argued the question on the danger of the precedent alone.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman; my desire is to understand him. It is now admitted that, so far as his knowledge extends, he knows nothing of any corrupt bargain, or any other thing impeaching, in any degree, the purity of the transaction. How, then, stands the case? The President of the United States is charged with having procured his office by means of a corrupt bargain, signed, sealed, and executed on this floor. The gentleman rises and disclaims all knowledge of any bargain. Yet, having no knowledge of corruption, or improper conduct, (and if he has none, I pray you who has?) he says the President and his Administration are unworthy of confidence. If he has no knowledge of the truth of the charge—if, with him, the charge is without a shadow of evidence—is he willing to set himself before the country as drawing inferences of guilt from facts, the existence of which he denies—of which he disclaims all knowledge or belief? Sir, such a course is, in my opinion, unjust, and I feel impelled by a strong sense of duty to meet and repel both the argument and the inference. I understood him to say, moreover, that the situation of the President and Secretary was worse than it would have been if there had been proof of a corrupt bargain.

[Mr. BUCHANAN explained. He had said that, admitting, for the sake of the argument, the transaction was pure, yet it was more dangerous than if it was proved to be corrupt, because under such a precedent, corruption would steal into the country. He knew he was correct, from the notes of the Reporter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Sir, I understand the Administration is alleged to be unworthy of confidence, and should be hunted down; that it was corrupt, and had outraged the moral sense of the community. What do we now hear? Admit that the transaction, to which all have referred as the origin of the charge, is pure, free from the taint of corruption, yet its tendency is to introduce corruption! Is it, indeed, true, that the pursuit of pure, honest, upright, constitutional means to obtain office in this country, is more dangerous in its tendency and influence than the employment of foul, dishonorable, corrupt means, to attain the end? Sir, I can neither admit nor believe it. The country will not credit it. I have heard the gentleman, in one of his happiest moods, support the proposition that the Constitution ought not to be amended in the provisions relating to the election of President. I have felt the force of his argument. What do I now hear? It is more dangerous to the liberties of the People to enter the Presidential Chair by the use of honest, constitutional means, than by open resort to bargain, intrigue, and corruption. This seems to me to be the alternative in which the gentleman has placed himself, and from which I see no escape. Sir, I had originally intended to say more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and to have examined his hypercriticism upon the act of 1810, and the construction put upon it in relation to outfits; but my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BARTLETT] has anticipated me, and done much better justice to the subject than I could. I will, therefore, leave the gentleman, after a single additional remark. Reverting to the former merits of the Secretary of State, the gentleman is pleased to think his sins are not unpardonable. When the Administration of which he is a member shall be pulled down and destroyed, and the great danger of the precedent is removed, then the gentleman is willing he should return to this House, to fight by his side, and, after due probation, and time for repentance, that he should be promoted to some more elevated station. As a friend of that distinguished individual, I acknowledge the kindness of the gentleman. Gratifying as it would be to him to fight by the side of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this House, it is probable no future event will afford the opportunity. But to my understanding, sir, there are unerring indications that, as sure as he lives, the time will come, and that, too, at no very remote period, when the calumniators of that great and good man, who has been pursued with a degree of malignity without parallel, will be silenced; when his exalted merits and important services will be properly appreciated by his fellow citizens, and rewarded by his elevation to the first office in their gift. And when that time shall arrive, I shall expect to find the gentleman, convinced of his purity, supporting the best interest of the country, in perfect harmony with the principles of his Administration.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVERS] whose eloquence yesterday riveted the attention of the House, with a force and perspicuity peculiarly his own, endeavored to prove the Administration profligate and extravagant, by comparison of the expenditures, &c. of other Administrations with those of this. I shall not, after the attention bestowed upon him by the gentleman from New Hampshire, undertake to follow him in detail, nor indeed could I do so, without time to examine the documents to which he referred. There are a few points, which, I believe, were not noticed by the gentleman from New Hampshire, to which alone I will ask your attention. The gentleman urged, among other reasons, why frequent inquiry was necessary in the expenditures of the Administration, that our revenue resulted from indirect taxation—that, if it sprung from direct taxation, the call of the tax gatherer would enable the People to see, and feel, and to connect their contributions with the expenditures. The gentleman did not say, nor do I know such to be his opinion, that we ought to resort to a system of direct taxation, instead of our present method. If such is his opinion, I oppose to it that of Mr. Jefferson, and that of the Republican party in former times. I remember well, Sir, the time, when party spirit in this country ran so high, that even ladies wore different cockades as badges of party attachment; and to have seen them meet at the Church door, and violently pluck the badges from one another's bosoms. Then I heard it was a Federal doctrine that our revenue should be raised by direct taxation, and not by duties on imports; but that doctrine was abandoned when Mr. Jefferson came into power—the direct tax laws were repealed, and they have never been resorted to since, except in time of war. Surely the gentleman would not have them restored. The gentleman, advertng to the course of the Administration, amongst matters urged to prove it unworthy of confidence, said, that, when men had crept into office by corrupt means, they would find money enough to reward all who had assisted in their elevation, and to quiet all disappointed candidates for office. What is intended to be inferred from this? Does he mean that the President has found money to distribute as rewards to those who assisted to elect him—money enough to quiet disappointed candidates? Does he really believe it? Does any man rise here, on this floor, and say such is the fact? No, sir, not one: and as to disappointed candidates, we have numerous living witnesses about us to prove that they have not been quieted. The gentleman has animadverted, with more asperity than he usually employs, upon what he terms lawless constructions of the Constitution and laws, adopted by the Administration to extend its power and patronage. What are lawless constructions? Who has the lawful right to construe the Constitution and laws in reference to the discharge of the Executive functions of this Government, but the President, with his Cabinet? They may err in construing the Constitution or laws, but their construction is not lawless. These lawless constructions—these usurpations of the Executive—have been carried to such lengths, as to call for the interference of the People to arrest their progress, as an act of self-preservation. The gentleman gives, as an instance of this lawless construction and usurpation, which he thinks was never before urged, the appointing foreign Ministers on original missions, in the recess of the Senate. Sir, I have thought, for many years, the exercise of this power by the Executive was not strictly warranted by the Constitution; but it has been maintained by many of the ablest men in the country, and, because I do not agree in their construction, it gives me no right to denounce their construction as lawless. The gentleman must know that this power was exercised by Washington and Jefferson, and, I believe, by every Executive since the organization of the Government. The Russian Mediation Mission, which terminated in the Treaty of Ghent, was originated by Mr. Madison in the recess of the Senate, and, unless my memory is faithless, one of the Commissioners, (Mr. Gallatin) whose nomination was afterwards submitted to the Senate, and rejected by that body, was nevertheless, continued in the Commission, and paid. If the construction of Mr. Adams is lawless, and he a usurper, then was the construction of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, lawless, and they, too, were usurpers.*

* President Adams has been accused of usurpation, and lawless assumption of authority, not because he has appointed any foreign minister in the recess of the Senate, on a new or original mission, but because, in his message to Congress, in December, 1823, relating to the invitation to meet the South American States in a Congress, to be held at Panama, he said, "the invitation has been accepted, and Ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to attend at these deliberations, and to take part in them, so far as may be compatible with that neutrality from which it is neither our intention, nor the desire of the other American States, that we should depart."

President Washington communicated to the Senate, in February, 1791, the difficulties that had existed between the Kingdom of Portugal and the United States, and in his message, he says: "On consideration of all the circumstances, I have determined to accede to the desire of the Court of Lisbon." And he concludes, "I have, therefore, nominated David Humphreys Minister resident from the United States to her Most Faithful Majesty the Queen of Portugal." Let any impartial man contrast the language of the two Presidents.

President Washington, in 1789, in the recess of the Senate, originated a Diplomatic Mission to Great Britain, and commissioned Governor Morris. In 1791, he originated a mission to Morocco, and appointed Thomas Barclay, Consul, to negotiate, in the recess of the Senate.

President Jefferson, during the first recess of the Senate, after his inauguration, appointed twenty-four Consuls and Commercial Agents, to different parts of the world, six of whom were original appointments, to places where such officers from the United States had not been sent before. In May, 1801, Mr. Jefferson, in the recess of the Senate,

I now come, sir, to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] I regret that I have not been able to get the floor, when the gentleman was in his seat, that I might have paid my respects when he was present. I come to him now last in order, considering him the commanding general of the Opposition force, and occupying the position of a commander, in the rear of his troops, controlling their movements; issuing his orders; directing one subaltern where and how to move his forces; admonishing another to due and proper caution, and to follow his leader; nodding approbation to a third, and prompting him to extraordinary exertion; examples of which, the gentleman has given us in this debate. Since the failure of the motion to lay this resolution on the table, the gentleman has become a warm and zealous friend of retrenchment and economy, a bitter enemy of profligacy and extravagance. I am glad of this. I will not attempt to answer his late arguments on the subject; but, I hope I shall not be deemed out of order, if I make him answer himself. His mind, I believe, has undergone an almost total revolution in a few years. In the debate on the Compensation Bill in this House, in 1816, the gentleman is reported to have said, amongst a great many other things—"the present system might do for maintaining soldiers, or day-laborers, but not for men of our time of life, and of our State." Here the gentleman exhibits a commendable State pride, and a proper regard for State rights, (the fashionable doctrine of the day) and of our dignity. Again, he says, "the salaries of the officers of Government were notoriously scanty, and though he would rather see the salary a disgrace to the man, than the man a disgrace to the office, he would give the public servants such salaries as would enable them to live without imputation of dishonor: for, he asked, what man can live here on $5,000 a year? He may breathe on it, but who can keep a family, rent a house, furnish it, keep an equipage, give and receive entertainments, on that annual amount? A five penny bit would be just as adequate to that purpose." Again, having proposed an amendment, as he said, "merely as a quidus to tender consciences," he thought $1500 an insufficient compensation, and said "there was no profession, scarcely, by which a man could not earn $1500 in six months, and do it much more pleasantly, too, than by coming here." Again, "his only objection to the bill was, that it had not made the compensation $2,500, instead of $1500—then a man might come here with something like the prospects of home." As to the compensation of the Speaker, and President of the Senate, he said, "he should have liked the bill better, if it had given $5,000 to each. The Speaker, he thought, ought to be enabled to take a House, and reside here as a great officer should do." These quotations may be sufficient to show the love of economy and retrenchment, and the perfect consistency of the present leader of the opposition party. I instituted the office of Secretary of Legation, and commissioned Thomas Sumpter, Jr. Secretary of the Legation to France; and in August, in the same year, he in like manner commissioned John Graham to the same office at Madrid.

President Madison, in 1813, commissioned Messrs. Adams, Gallatin, and Bayard, to treat with Great Britain, under the Russian mediation. It is a singular fact, in relation to this mission, that the anti-war party in the Senate, in 1814, led by Mr. Gore, of Massachusetts, attacked President Madison for exercising this power, and he was sustained by the entire Republican party.

The treaty with Spain, in which Florida was ceded to the United States provided for instituting a commission to ascertain the claims of our citizens against Spain, to "be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." President Monroe commissioned, among others, Messrs. Tazewell and White, now of the Senate, to fill this new office, in the recess of the Senate, and of course without its consent and advice, and they entered upon the duties of their office.

It would swell the limits of a note too much to enlarge upon the exercise of this power. Further information can be found in the 10th volume of White's State Papers, and a list of appointments up to 1814, in Senate Documents State Papers, 2d Session, 13th Congress, No. 17.—Note by Mr. W.

will make one other quotation, sir, to show his regard for the will of the People, which is now so much harped upon. In the same debate, in reply to a gentleman from South Carolina, he said, "the gentleman had advised us to go home and consult our constituents. Consult them for what! For four pence half penny. Instead of receiving instructions from his constituents on this subject, he would instruct them." The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] said, if these things are done in the green tree, what may we not expect in the dry? If these remarks are to be considered as having fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] in the green tree, we need not feel any surprise, at what falls from him now in the dry.

The gentleman said the other day, in the notice he condescended to take of my friend and colleague, [Mr. VANCE] he did not regret the vote he gave against the admission of Ohio into the Union—if it were to do over again, he would do the same thing—he never would vote for the admission of another new State. Sir, I represent a portion of one of these new States, and, for myself and my constituents, I claim, and will exercise equal rights and privileges with the gentleman from Virginia, or with any other gentleman from any one of the old thirteen States. We came into the Union upon a footing of perfect equality, and we intend to maintain a perfect equality of rights. I should be gratified to know, if the People of the new States are to consider this declaration of the leader of the party as a declaration of hostility by the party against them. Be it so, if they will. I have heard the gentleman, on a former occasion, speak contemptuously of the People of Ohio and the Western country, and exert his greatest power to bring them into ridicule. He remarked upon their dress and manners—their hunting shirts, moccasins, their leggins, their scalping knives, and tomahawks, and rifles; their half savage ferocity. Sir, I like the blunt honesty of this representative from one of the old thirteen. If the gentleman feels his dignity lessened by sitting here with the Representatives of these half savage, hunting shirt, and moccasin men, he must try to bear with it the best way he can. We may improve our looks and mend our manners after a little longer intercourse with the gentleman, and other members from the old thirteen States. Whatever opinion he may have of the Representatives from the West, if he will visit the country, and see the People, witness their industry, observe their love of order and decency, and partake of their hospitality and abundance, his respect for them will increase; but they will not part with any portion of their political rights, nor consent to be placed here in any degrading relation. On another occasion, I have heard of the gentleman's speaking of the non-slave holding States, something like this—I quote from memory. "You of the North have divided, we of the South have united, and can always unite—we have divided and conquered you once, and we can do it again. When we conquer you once more, we will drive you to the wall; and when we get you there, we will nail you to the counter like base money." We shall see, perhaps, ere long, whether the People of the non-slave holding States will be again divided, driven to the wall, and nailed to the counter like base money, at the will of the gentleman. It remains to be seen whether threats of this kind are to be carried into execution and submitted to—if they are, the People of those States will richly deserve to be nailed down like base money; they will be undeserving the privileges of freemen.

The gentleman discourses upon matters and things in general, and is exceedingly happy in being always in order. When the resolutions were in their original shape, such discourse was according to their letter. I will not undertake to follow his course. In a few sentences, the other day, he brought together, in singular relation to each other and the subject, Peter Porcupine, the Essex Junto, Polyphemus, Barnabas Bidwell, the Jackson Party, Purdy, and the horse Eclipse. Politics, like misery, brings one acquainted with strange companions. I have lately heard a great many jockey and gaming phrases introduced into debate, by gentlemen, but I little expected they would introduce jockey riders and race horses into our discussions. We have one instance recorded of an attempt to make a horse a Senator, and to clothe him in official robes; but I cannot suppose the gentleman, much as he admires Eclipse, would confer Senatorial dignity upon him, or bring him into this House. The gentleman says the expenses of this Government are not to be reduced but by the election of the Opposition candidate, and again reducing our expenditures to specific appropriations, avoiding contingent funds and constructive powers. On this subject, I will refer the gentleman to the accounts of General Jackson for holding Indian Treaties, while enjoying the full pay and emoluments of a Major General; his travelling expenses from Nashville to New York, and to his expenses of many dollars for wine and other luxuries to supply his table, while Governor of Florida, and receiving the pay and emoluments of his station. I do not complain of these allowances; they were doubtless made for good cause; but, if the accounts of Mr. Adams, and the allowances to him prove him unfit for the Presidency, these claims of General Jackson, and allowances to him, cannot go far to prove him better qualified. I think none will be able to find either usage, or legal provision, or specific appropriation, for these expenditures.

Considering the relation in which I stand to the gentleman from Virginia, I hope he will not consider me out of the rules of common courtesy, if, while I congratulate him and his friends on the remarkable ease with which he discharges his duty as leader, and his increased activity in the good cause, I offer him my condolence on the difficulties which so much afflicted him when he appeared among us yesterday. These difficulties which disturb him so much, are only those incident to his station as head of the political family: these little "family jars" will happen in the best regulated families: they should be expected, and the gentleman should not allow them to throw him into such violent agitation: he will soon become familiar with them. Surely, he who can keep young doctors from administering medicine, call in the political hounds from the chase, and whip stragglers within the lines, at his pleasure, should bear such trifling crosses. In the report objected to, the gentleman complains that he is made to say he offered himself a volunteer witness on the charge of corruption. If he was not a volunteer witness, pray what sort of witness was he? His attendance had not been coerced, by subpoena or otherwise. He took the stand and gave his evidence without compulsion. I certainly would not be guilty of testifying the general credit of the paper that the gentleman handled yesterday with gloves on, as if it were unsafe to touch it with tongs; yet I believe a large portion of the House understood him to say pretty much what he is reported to have said—else, what relation to the subject had his declaration that he knew something of a corrupt bargain between two of the high contracting parties? Why did he say it was just before the election, when Mr. Crawford obstinately refused to die, while it was uncertain how the vote of Louisiana had been given, and who would be the third candidate returned to the House? But, sir, as the witness desires the privilege of explaining away, or taking back what it was understood he said, I will not hold him to the statement. From what he now says, it appears he knows nothing relevant to the subject in dispute. I should have called the gentleman to order yesterday for his remarks, if he had not volunteered himself, and being then giving testimony to stultify the official organ of his party. On that account I left it to others to interfere. I hope the gentleman will not despair: he has reason to be encouraged: his remarks of yesterday have already produced an important effect. He has drawn to himself the encouraging notice of the Editor upon whom he commented. In the paper of this morning, the Editor remarks upon the proceedings of yesterday, from which I will read a passage or two: "We say, we consider the manner, as well as the occasion, particularly unfortunate for Mr. Randolph. He knows, and so does every member of the Senate, that he is more indebted to this paper, than to any individual, for a disinterested vindication of that reputation upon which he places so high an estimate." Again, he says: "It was therefore, unfortunate for Mr. Randolph, that he should have impeached, in the manner in which he has chosen to do it, the only press which, at this place, has presented a barrier to the accumulated calumnies, that, but for us, would have crushed him to the earth. We have defended him when his favorite press, in his own State, has faltered." Sir, how could the gentleman feel justified in waging war upon a press that had so magnanimously sustained him, and but for which he would have been crushed to the earth? But, let the gentleman be encouraged; he will yet be sustained by the same press: his offence, thought great, will be forgiven—not revenged. Nay, the gentleman has cause for gratulation, in having met so magnanimous an antagonist. He has even excited his compassion, and drawn forth his pity. I will read: "We know the causes which operate upon a sensibility too easily excited at all times, and rendered, at this moment, more irritable by disease, have led to this attack. Were we to act under a similar impulse, we would leave Mr. R. to his fate; we would silence our press as to him; but we act from higher and nobler motives." Here is a magnanimity that is truly praiseworthy, which, I hope, will reassure the gentleman from Virginia he will not be left to his fate. The gentleman from Virginia, who has been in public life a fourth of a century, will not be crushed into the earth; will not be left to his fate. How generous! These Editors will sustain him for the cause they unite with him in supporting! I cannot take leave of the gentleman, without recommending to him amidst the difficulties that perplex him, the application of the legal maxim he called your attention to the other day, "De minimis non curat lex."

I have now done with this thing forever—I hope no one will mistake the matter to which I allude; I have done with this thing—not with the gentleman from Virginia—him I hope to meet often, in good health, and to unite with him in the work of reform.

Mr. HAMILTON rose and said: I hope that the wish of the member from Ohio will be gratified, and that he may be destined to meet my friend from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] on this floor. But, when he desires to signalize his valor by such a rencontre, I trust he will meet him face to face, and not assail him behind his back.

Mr. KREMER said, by this time, doubtless, the House is ready to inquire whether I have risen again, at this late hour, to discuss the merits of this resolution. No; I have not risen for that purpose. It would be paying but little respect to the understanding of the House were I to attempt to shed any additional light upon this subject. It has been fully discussed. And I had hoped the speaking mania had ceased. In this expectation I have been disappointed. I now feel it necessary to take notice of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WRIGHT] because, although on certain occasions, and towards certain men, silence speaks a significant language, its meaning is not always understood, and any answer being an act of civility, I take notice of the gentleman, lest he might think himself neglected. I will not follow him through his very lengthy speech, which contained neither argument, reason, nor amusement.

The gentleman from Ohio has told us, that the People will decide this question. I have no doubt, sir, that the People, in 1828, will measure that justice to the younger, which they meted out to the elder Adams, in 1800. He tells us that there is no corruption here! Shall I enter into an argument to prove that two and two make four? Could that render this truth more clear? Shall I, by the force of argument, undertake to prove the existence of the sun? Yet, sir, that is not more clear than the corruption of this coalition. What! Have we not seen the Speaker of this House, who held an influence over five Western States, make the President of this Union? And have we not seen him receiving the price which it was "said and believed" would be paid for his abandonment of duty to his constituents? And yet, the gentleman says that he cannot believe; and that there is no proof! Does the gentleman expect that witnesses were called to witness the dark deed? No, witnesses are never called on such occasions! Deeds of darkness shun the day.

I have seen queer things in my time. The gentleman has read long extracts from newspapers, and favoured us with a huge pile of books. I do not know why that huge pile was brought here, unless it was expected that the House would receive a mass of books for argument. To this huge pile, I can only oppose a single extract from a newspaper. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have seen many queer things—and I hold one now in my hand, which I will read. It is an extract from a letter written by a distinguished, although not an eminent lawyer, as he himself has said, a member of this House.

[Mr. KREMER then read the following extract of a letter written by Jno. C. Wright to Charles King, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Ohio Legislature, and dated at Washington City, January 20th, 1827, as quoted by Mr. King in his letter to the editor of the United States' Telegraph, dated Chillicothe, May 17, 1827:]

"It has probably been determined that Old Hickory shall not be withdrawn. We, of Ohio, I believe had better stand aloof, and let them poll. We have little interest in the game. With Adams, we never can be affiliated—we are antipodes to him. Our Kentucky friends seem to be willing to have us with them, if we will fight their battles, and secure them all the sweetmeats, under the pretence of keeping old Kentucky in the shafts. In truth, the folks can't keep up without Ohio, and they do not feel disposed to give Ohio any thing."

Now, (proceeded Mr. KREMER) allow me to ask the gentleman from Ohio, how he accounts for the sudden conversion of this letter-writer? He has now become a zealous advocate for the coalition. I do not pretend to talk with the gentleman from Ohio, who has said that the gentleman from Virginia is our leader. This I deny. The People have no leaders. They have taken their own cause into their own hands, and will elect General Jackson, in defiance of the politicians. The gentleman from Ohio can inform us why it is that he is not now disposed to wait for old Kentuck—he, no doubt, can tell us all about the sweet-meats: for he is the carter who cracks the whip, and drives the Administration team.

Mr. DRAYTON then obtained the floor, but yielded it at the request of

Mr. WRIGHT, who said, to the remarks you have just heard, Mr. Speaker, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been put forth to make, at me, nor to the scandalous publication that has been furnished him from which he read, and in relation to which he questioned me with such evident satisfaction to himself, and those who put him in motion, I shall give no reply. But, Sir, I hold in my hand a paper purporting to be a certified copy from the records of the Court in the county of Northumberland, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, of a bill of indictment against one Geo. Kremer, for perjury, and I ask if it would be in order to read that as a reply to the gentleman?

II. OF R.]

Retrenchment.

[FEB. 6, 1828.]

The CHAIR said it would certainly not be in order.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, moved the previous question; but was prevailed on by those around him to withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. KREMER rose to reply to Mr. WRIGHT, beginning by saying, "I am the man named in that bill of indictment," but was called to order by the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of N. C., inquired if Mr. WHIFFLE, [who had been called to order by the Speaker] might not proceed; having taken his seat when required to do so by the Chair?

The SPEAKER said, that the gentleman from N. Hampshire had forfeited his right to the floor. The SPEAKER felt no wish to restrain, improperly, any member from addressing the House. For the last nine or ten hours he had been, although indisposed, in his chair, anxiously endeavoring to preserve the order and dignity of the House, and restrain any thing like disorder; but he found it impossible, without interposing the power of the Chair. He had, therefore, deemed it his duty, after repeated calls and violations of order, to direct the member from New Hampshire to take his seat, and should not permit him to proceed, without the assent of the House.

Mr. DORSEY now moved to insert the amendment he had offered yesterday, and which he had withdrawn to day, to enable Mr. BARTLETT to address the House on the main question, viz: to insert in the amendment proposed by Mr. HAMILTON, and agreed to by the House, after the words "secret service fund," these words: since the first day of July, 1790.

On this motion, the yeas and nays, were ordered by the House.

Mr. DRAYTON said, from the tenor of the resolutions moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CHILTON] and of the amendments to them, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMILTON] it appears, that their objects are to enquire into the expenditures of this Administration, and to ascertain whether they cannot be diminished. To one of these expenditures, that relating to what has been termed "the secret service fund," the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DORSEY] exclusively applies, and is amendatory of an amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, upon the same subject. No other exception, then, could be urged against the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, than that it was superfluous, being embraced within the scope of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. Admitting this to be the case, it is not worth an argument, or rather the time which the argument would consume, to show that the amendment is superfluous; because its reception will not interfere with, or embarrass the proceedings of any committee, to which the pending resolutions may be referred. But, if the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is calculated to render more full and perfect the information sought for by my colleague, then, of course, it ought to be adopted: that it is calculated to produce this effect, seems to me, to be manifest. The mere specification of the amount of moneys disbursed by the present Executive, out of the secret service fund, unconnected with the knowledge of what has been expended, out of the same fund, by his predecessors, would be useless. Without comparing together the amounts thus disbursed by the President and by his predecessors, and taking into consideration the times, and the situation of the country, in its internal and external relations, we can arrive at no conclusion approaching to satisfactory. These comparisons are impossible, unless the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland be acted upon, and therefore, it ought to be adopted. With all possible official lights, we shall still be at a loss to form an opinion, upon the propriety or impropriety of disbursements, regulated by Executive discretion, often exercised upon delicate transactions, which both policy and good faith require to be kept secret. It has been suggested, that the committee without this amendment would make the investigation it calls for; but they might not. By the tenor of the resolution, relating to the secret service fund, they would not be, necessarily, lent to that extended investigation, as the language of the resolution limits the inquiry to the disbursements by the President in office. To guard against any omission, and to obtain the facts required, we, therefore, give to our Committee the instructions we think proper for its guidance. Committees are the organs of this House; and 'tis the right, and the duty of the House to give them such directions as it thinks best calculated to attain its objects, and not to leave to inference, what may be rendered definite and certain. 'Tis also desirable, whenever an inquiry is instituted into the conduct of a public officer, that every semblance of prejudice, or party spirit, should be evident. In moving his amendment, my friend and colleague was influenced by fair and honorable motives; but, if an amendment, the effect of which is to throw light upon the conduct of this President, by comparing it with that of other Presidents, under similar circumstances, should be rejected; then the inference might be drawn, that the resolution of my colleague was framed with the view of excluding necessary and important information, and a character be thus given to it at variance with what he intended. In conducting an inquiry into the conduct of a public officer, we ought not only to have all the evidence before us, which we think is calculated to enlighten our judgments, but which the friends of that officer, upon this floor, may deem necessary for his justification, unless what is required should be plainly indative. Whether the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland be important or unimportant, may admit of a difference of opinion: that it is not indative, will be conceded by every one. For these reasons, I am in favor of the amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. KREMER again rose to explain, in reply to Mr. WRIGHT, but was called to order by Mr. DORSEY.

The SPEAKER rose, and addressed the House. He said that he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as expressing a wish to explain. For his part, he felt bound to give him the floor. An allusion had been made by the gentleman from Ohio, to a paper, which was calculated to implicate deeply, the private character of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Although the gentleman from Ohio had been stopped by the Chair from reading that paper; yet the allusion to it, under the circumstances, might, without explanation, have an injurious effect upon the character and feelings of the member from Pennsylvania. It was, therefore, due to the gentleman, to his constituents, and to the House, that he should have an opportunity of explaining. The Chair should not, therefore, pronounce the gentleman from Pennsylvania out of order, but would permit him to explain.

Mr. KREMER said, it is true that I was prosecuted for perjury; it is equally true, that I was triumphantly acquitted without the jury leaving their box. The prosecution originated in consequence of a suit which occasioned, in Pennsylvania, considerable excitement; (Snyder vs. Snyder, the late Governor of that State.) This suit had been brought to August term, 1805, when great political excitement existed. It was first tried in November, 1806. I was then examined as a witness. It was afterwards tried, but the year I do not distinctly recollect, but it was down for trial at November term, 1810. The importance of my testimony was well known to the plaintiffs, and they had no hope of success unless they could shake my credibility. For that purpose the prosecution was got up, on testimony which I had given a short time before, in another case, in which one of the same plaintiffs was a party. Every particle of testimony which I had given; I substantially proved to be true—and so entirely satisfied was the Court, that they declared that they would not lend their sanction to such a proceeding; that if the defendant wished a verdict, it might be taken from the box. It was so taken. And so entirely satisfied of my innocence were the Court, the bar, and the people, that there was not one of the Judges or counsel concerned, who has not remained my warm friend through life.

Not long afterwards, I was elected by the people a member of the Legislature, and continued by them as long as I desired to remain. About the same time, I was elected a manager of the Northumberland Bridge Company, in sight of the town of Sunbury, where the trial was held, with Mr. Hall, one of the prosecuting attorneys, and several other political opponents, of the first standing in the county, who were always my personal friends.

Sometime afterwards, I was elected President of the Lewisburg Bridge Company, of which I had been a manager from its commencement, and acted as such as long as I was willing to serve. I have been three times elected to Congress. The last time, out of twelve thousand votes, I did not lose three hundred: and, in the town of Sunbury, the very seat of this transaction, out of three hundred, I did not lose ten votes. This, I think, is a sufficient reply, and must satisfy every candid and honorable man, that there was no foundation for the charge thus attempted to be made against me. Can the gentleman from Ohio produce as strong evidence of his good standing at home? I now appeal to the House to say, whether any man of honor, any man of feeling, would introduce so base a charge? No, sir, no gentleman would have done it. None other than the base pander of a corrupt coalition would have done it.

[Here Mr. KREMER was called to order by the SPEAKER, and resumed his seat.]

Mr. WRIGHT now obtained the floor, when

Mr. HAILE called him to order, and said, he hoped the member from Ohio would be put down.

The SPEAKER said Mr. WRIGHT was entitled to the floor, and would proceed.

Mr. WRIGHT said, Sir, I wish this subject to be understood. I neither read the indictment nor offered to read it. I thought the paper quite as pertinent to the subject under discussion as the paper furnished to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and from which he read. What I did say on that subject, I will repeat: "Sir, I hold in my hand a paper, purporting to be a certified copy from the records of the Court in Northumberland County, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, of a bill of indictment against one George Kremer, for perjury," and I asked if it would be in order to read that as a reply to the gentleman. While I am up, sir, if permitted, I will make a single remark, farther. The case explained by the gentleman, in which he was indicted for perjury and acquitted, does not appear to be the same one described in the paper I have. The parties to the suit, when the evidence was given in, are different from those named by him.

Mr. HAMILTON then made a statement in opposition to the amendment of Mr. DORSEY, to which he objected as including a period of war, the money paid to John Henry, &c. but suggested to Mr. D. to modify his amendment so as to go back to the close of the late war.

Mr. DORSEY refused to modify his amendment, and made a few explanatory remarks.

The question then being on Mr. DORSEY's amendment to Mr. HAMILTON's resolution,

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR said, he should vote against it; but wished to introduce another in its place, carrying back the inquiry to the 4th March, 1817.

Vox. IV—92

The question was then taken on Mr. DORSEY's amendment, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative.

The question now recurring on the amendment of Mr. BLAKE, as amended by Mr. HAMILTON, and modified by Mr. DORSEY, [which latter amendment was virtually a substitute for the amendment of Mr. BLAKE,]

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the yeas and nays, and explained his reason. He had voted against Mr. HAMILTON's amendment before, because he preferred that of Mr. BLAKE; but he should now vote for it, because he desired the inquiry, and preferred the amendment to the original resolution.

The yeas and nays being taken, were yeas 173, nays 2.

The question was then put to agree to the resolutions of Mr. CHILTON, as amended, and was determined in the affirmative unanimously.

So the resolutions passed in the following form:

"Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire and report to this House, if any, and what, retrenchment can be made, with safety to the public interest, in the number of the officers of the Government of the United States, and in the amount of salaries which they may respectively receive; more especially, to report specifically on the following heads:

1st. What reductions of expense can be made in the State Department, in the number and salaries of the officers and clerks attached to this Department, in the expenses regulating the foreign intercourse, and in the printing and distribution of the public laws of the United States.

2d. What reductions in the Treasury Department, and whether an effective system of accountability, and for the collection of the public dues, is there established.

3d. What reductions of expense can be made in the Navy Department, in the clerks and officers now acting subordinately to the Secretary of the Navy.

4th. What reductions of expense can be made in the Department of War, in the Indian Department, and in the clerks and officers now acting subordinately to the Secretary of War.

5th. What reductions of expense can be made in the number of officers, and the amount of compensation which they may receive, in the Postmaster General's Department.

And that the Committee be further instructed to examine the several contingent funds of each of these Departments, and to report the amount and objects for which disbursements have been made, from these funds; and that they report the amounts, vouched and unvouched, which have been paid from the secret service fund, since the first day of July, 1790, or the fund regulating the contingencies of foreign intercourse, and of the fund for the expenses of the intercourse with the Barbary Powers.

And that they further report whether the compensation of members of Congress should be reduced; and whether the fixed salaries of the officers of this House and its contingent expenses, can, with propriety, be diminished.

And further that they inquire whether any modification of the sinking fund act can be made, with a view of producing a more speedy extinguishment of the public debt."

Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. INGHAM, Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. RIVES, Mr. EVERETT, Mr. WICKLIFFE, and Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, were appointed the Committee.

THE CASE OF MARIGNY D'AUTERIVE.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Marigny D'Auterive came up for its third reading; and the question being—shall the bill pass?

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved that that question be taken by yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. MINER said, before the question should be taken,

Case of Marigny D'Auterive.

he wished to be heard. That the subject was important, was manifest from the deep interest it had excited. I had intended, said Mr. M. to have addressed you at an earlier stage of the discussion; but one gentleman rose after another, anxious to be heard, and I could not bring myself to believe that what I had to offer was of as much consequence as what they would advance, and I remained silent. One or two gentlemen touched pretty strongly the points which seemed to me material to the case: the gentleman who first spoke from New York, [Mr. CLARK] and my honorable friend near me, [Mr. MARTINDALE] but no one has placed the subject in exactly the light in which it presents itself to my mind, and I must ask leave to speak for myself.

What is the real question—the point upon which we are at issue? Is it the amount involved? The sum in dispute is less than two hundred and fifty dollars; less than the cost in time expended in reading the documents. That is not the question. Is it because the slave was impressed? I heard the ingenious constitutional argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORRS] with lively pleasure. To the sound doctrines asserted by him and his colleague, [Mr. S. WOOD] I give my hearty assent. But if impressment was the material and governing point in the case, the objection would apply with equal force to paying for the horse and cart, which were forcibly taken as well as the negro; and to paying for the horse and cart no objection is made; not a voice heard. The bill would have passed sub silentio had not the amendment been proposed to pay for the slave. Sir, ingenious and eloquent as was the argument on the subject of impressment, the whole House, I think, felt with me that this was not the real question to be decided. Is it whether slaves are property? Have the legal rights of the master been questioned? Has not his absolute control, under the laws, to the custody and services of his slave, been admitted? But it is argued, that slaves are private property. Private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation being made. A slave has been taken; therefore, he must be paid for. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this embraces the real point at issue, all is as clear as a syllogism can make it. Perfect demonstration. And why is there, or should there be, any difficulty in the matter? I again confidently appeal to the House, and ask, if while we listened to the ingenious argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT] it was not known and felt that it did go to the root of the matter?

If these had been the real questions, why all this excitement—this feverish excitement—and high-wrought anxiety? Why, if the case is so simple and plain, have such claims been rejected, from the foundation of the Government up to this day, though frequently presented and pressed upon Congress? Why has the Committee of Claims, a committee whose intelligence, whose adherence to just principles, and whose careful research and industry, have given them, in an eminent degree, the confidence of the House and the nation—why has that committee, steadily and perseveringly, reported against such claims? And, let me inquire further, why this protracted debate, and how is it to be accounted for, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] should have desired the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to withdraw his amendment?

All goes to shew, Mr. Speaker, that the real merits of the question lie deeper—that these fair and plausible arguments do not touch the marrow of the matter. No, sir, the real question at issue is of vastly more importance—of deep and vital interest to this community. And what is that question? In my judgment, it is: In what relation do slaves stand to this Government, and what obligations and duties spring from that relation? In other words—Is this Government bound to consider them merely as property?—or, is it to regard them as persons, from whom may be exacted duties which all persons owe to the Government? Sir, this is a most important matter, not to the South alone, but deeply interesting to the North and West; for, it involves the question of the relative duties, sacrifices and sufferings, of the South, North, and West, in times of war—in cases of extreme pressure—in periods of great suffering, which have come to all nations, and may come to us. This view of the subject I propose to discuss freely and fearlessly, but certainly fairly as possible. I would not willingly give pain or offence. We have not brought this subject here. We have not brought on this discussion, and are in no degree responsible for the excitement it has produced. The subject of slavery is always a delicate one, but it cannot be concealed that it is a great interest in this nation. It is impossible, in the nature of things, that such numbers should exist in any nation without being a matter of frequent and grave consideration to the statesman. We cannot shut our eyes to its magnitude and rapid increase. It is not an inert mass of matter, of no national concernment. It presents an aspect which the prescient eye of the statesman cannot fail to regard with interest, if not with anxiety. The political relation of that class to this National Government also renders it a fair subject of consideration. Delicate, therefore, as the subject may be, it cannot always be evaded. I hope to be pardoned for supposing that the views taken, and the peculiar turn given to the argument, arose from the unpleasantness of entering into the subject in the aspect I view it. In my judgment, the great interests of the Republic require that this, like every other subject which concerns the nation, should, within this Hall, be openly and freely discussed—considered in all its National lights and bearings—and that, too, without any cause of offence. It would be strange, indeed, if it were the fact, that there is a class so considerable, an interest so extensive, presenting a political aspect so national and imposing, which the Representatives of the People, in this Hall, sacred to free discussion, must not speak of. I do not think so. And while I express my sentiments without reserve, I pray gentlemen to recollect, if, in error, Mr. Jefferson has told us of "the safety with which error may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it."

On what ground, then, is the claim of D'Auterive, for his injured slave, sustained? If I comprehend it perfectly, it is: 1. That slaves are to be considered by this Government merely as property; 2d. That, if taken into the public service, it must be merely as property, and not as persons; 3d. That they can be used only as taken as property, not as persons—that is, to labor, not to defend by arms; and, as a resulting consequence, 1st. That, in all future wars, all slaves used by the Government, in any emergency, if slain or injured, are to be a charge upon the public Treasury: 2d. That, in all future time, however pressing may be the exigencies and distress of the country, the slave population is wholly beyond the constitutional power of the Government, for defence. In the language of an honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR] that "slaves can, in no case, be considered or treated as militia—as troops: that is out of the question. Such a proposition cannot even be received for discussion." To these propositions I am not prepared to accede.

It has been well remarked, on one side, that what the law has made property, is property. And it was admirably answered, on the other, Those are persons whom God hath made persons. The African has been made property by man. He was formed a person by his Maker. But the question we have to consider, is, How is he regarded by the Constitution? That is the chart to guide us. The Constitution is our manual and text-brook. What that considers them, so, most clearly, are we, the creatures of, and acting under its authority, bound to consider them. The Constitution was advertised to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK.] I wish to bring out the passages which refer to the subject in somewhat bolder relief. They appear to me to have a strong influence upon the question. And permit me here to say, I cannot agree with another honorable member, that it is hypocritical to consider the expressions of the Constitution as having a direct bearing on the matter. I do not admit that the words there used, were used from mere delicacy, to avoid the word slave; but that they were well weighed, duly considered, and meant to have the precise signification which they purport to bear. In article 4, section 2, it is said: "No person, held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged," &c. Again: article 1, section 9, "The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited," &c. Slaves, in both cases, are referred to, and are styled persons. I beg leave again to refer you to article 1, section 2: "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." Those other persons, of course, are slaves. The Constitution, therefore, every where regards, and speaks of them, as persons. They impart large political powers, as persons. They give a powerful representation on this floor as persons. Sir, I deny that this representation is in consequence of direct taxes being apportioned in the manner provided, as has been urged by some gentlemen. Such a sentiment would seem to me to be disrespectful to the great and good men who framed this admirable system of Government. What, sir, sell the right of representation for money! Give to any portion of the Union an undue proportion of representative power, upon condition of its contributing a trifle more to the public Treasury! Sell the sovereign power of legislation over them, for considerations merely mercenary! Allow persons to make laws for them, in respect to life, liberty, and property, merely to escape an occasional direct tax! Are these the men who resisted the right of the British Parliament to make laws for them, because they were not fairly represented in Parliament, even to blood, putting life and sacred honor at stake on the contest? No, sir, I cannot do them such injustice. The apportionment of direct taxes was a consequence, not a cause; it followed, and did not go before; it followed fairly and justly the established principle of representation.

To establish the point that slaves are regarded by the Constitution as persons, and not merely as property, I will present another view. Suppose two States lay side by side; equal in territory; equal in numbers. Suppose one State poor and sterile—poor as Sparta with her black broth and iron money. Suppose the other rich as it is possible to conceive her—the mines of Potosi in her bosom—having all the wealth of "Ormus and of Ind;" and added thereto the gold coining mines of the richest manufactures of Great Britain. Sir, in political power these States would be equal; according to your fundamental law—exactly equal. Property is not represented in the Federal Government. The principle may prevail in some of the States. Here it is excluded—unknown. The poor and the rich State stand in an exact equality as it respects representation here. Advance a step further. Suppose to the State already abounding in wealth, you add more riches, in the proportion of five to three—heaping Pelion upon Ossa, and all solid gold. Is her political power—is her representative number increased? Not the least. But add to the poor State, slave persons or property, in the proportion of five to three, what effect would such addition have on her representative power? It would be doubled. It is as persons, therefore, and not as property, that they are represented. 1st. Thus nature hath made them persons. 2d. The Constitution constantly speaks of them as persons. 3d. They impart large political power as persons. In the electoral colleges for the choice of President and Vice-President, they give more than twenty votes—about one-twelfth of the whole. On this floor, those persons give a representation, equal to that of the whole existing representation of nine States. Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Delaware, Rhode Island, Vermont, and two or three more. Sir, this is a political interest of great magnitude, of a national aspect, to which we cannot be indifferent if we would; and ought not if we could. It is the duty of the statesman to look it full in the face; to see its bearings; to trace its influence, and to be careful that, under the plea of the delicacy or excitement which may arise from speaking of it, unjust principles be not established, which may prove hereafter extensively injurious.

Then comes the solemn question: If they are so regarded, and if they impart so much power and influence as persons, why shall they not, in common with all others, perform the duties of persons, in times of extreme distress and pressing emergency? I pray you to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we have not come here to ask the House to establish this position—we do not wish the House to affirm this proposition; but the question being brought here by those interested in slaves, and different principles being avowed, we are compelled either to submit to their construction—to permit the negative of the proposition to be established, what we deem a dangerous precedent set, or to contend against it. And how can we disprove the negative, but by arguing affirmatively? We do not wish to discuss the question at all. It is forced upon us. I was silent, until, wholly unexpectedly, the amendment and bill, on a second reading, being sustained by a majority, alarmed me. Should the bill now be negative or laid on the table, no principle is settled—no precedent is set which can possibly be injurious to the Southern interest. It may be taken that the bill was laid aside, not on principle, but from expediency—from want of due proof. No principle is involved in a negative decision.—Not so if the bill passes. In such case, especially after the arguments urged and the doctrines avowed, the principle would be fairly considered as solemnly established, that slaves are merely property—not to be regarded by us as persons bound to protect the soil, wholly beyond the powers of this government for defence; and, if any of them are injured or slain in battle, that they are a charge on the National Treasury.

To see this matter in its proper light, it is worth while to look into its magnitude. What is the slave population? Nearly two millions of souls; and must embrace not far from four hundred thousand able-bodied men. Our census, every ten years, tells us of its rapid increase. What will it be in half a century, if it continues to advance? Sir, the lad who sports in this area, and brings resolutions to your table, may live, lingering yet in your lobby, the old and faithful door keeper, recounting to those who come after us, anecdotes of the distinguished men now in my view—how this one spoke—how that delighted—and of those who may appear on this floor from time to time, as the stream bears us onwards—that lad may yet live, so rapid is their multiplication, to see this class increased to twelve millions, having among them two millions of able-bodied men. Protesting against the wish to establish, affirmatively, any right to the services of these for defence, we may yet be led to doubt the wisdom of admitting that they may not be so used. When their number and rapid increase are considered, it becomes a momentous question. If they are wholly exempt from the military power of this Government, the fact is most important, because it would follow that the burdens of war must fall, with seven fold force, on the North and West. In time of great pressure for men, not only must personal duties fall more heavily on the free States, involving the loss of life and health, but they must be subjected to vast and inevitable sacrifices of property, from the abandonment and neglect of business. As slaves increase, in the same proportion, if no part may be called upon for defence, must the free white citizens of the States, where they exist, be kept at home for the preservation of domestic peace. Their exemption, therefore, not only takes so many persons from the list, but actually occasions the absence of nearly as many more to guard them. Laws already exist in some, perhaps several, of the States, where slavery prevails, providing that only a certain portion of the militia shall leave the State at one time.

The burdens of defence are already, from existing causes, heavier on the free States than on those which have slaves. Your tables of enlistments, showing the proportion of soldiers who enter the public service from the different portions of the Union, would put this matter in a striking point of light. Look, too, at the militia of the States. In Ohio, if I am rightly instructed, one-fifth of the population are on the muster-roll; in Louisiana, one-fifteenth; in South Carolina, one-nineteenth. The tax, the heavy tax, of arms, uniforms, trainings, and ammunition, bears, in time of peace, with three-fold severity upon us now. What, then, must it be in time of war, even in ordinary contests? But admit the principle contended for by those who sustain this bill, and how exceedingly unfair and disproportioned would be the burdens of the North and South in time of great trial and severe pressure.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the great and delicate point, that the slave population may be touched by the General Government in time of war, is admitted. Under the eminent domain, it is conceded that slaves may be taken as property. All that is delicate in the question—the right of the National Government to take this property, or touch those persons, being admitted, we may proceed to discuss how, and when, they may be taken, under another principle, with less reserve. I beg, then, to ask, what is the eminent domain of sovereignty; and would earnestly inquire whether writers on public law do not lay down the position as broadly and comprehensively, that all persons are subject to the power of Government as well as all property. Vattel, book 1, ch. 20—"The State could not subsist, or constantly administer the public affairs in the most advantageous manner, if it had not the power to dispose, occasionally, of all kinds of property, subject to its authority. It is even to be presumed, that, when the nation takes possession of a country, the property of certain things is given up to individuals only with this reserve. The right which belongs to the society, or to the sovereign, of disposing, in case of necessity, of and for the public safety, of all the wealth contained in the State, is called the eminent domain. It is evident that this right is, in certain cases, necessary to him who governs, and constantly, is part, of this empire of sovereign powers," &c. Now, Sir, let us turn to another page, and see what the same writer has said, in respect to the power of Government over persons. In treating of war, book 3, ch. 2—"Every citizen is bound to defend the State as far as he is capable. Society cannot otherwise be maintained; and this concurrence for the common defence is one of the principal objects of every political association. Every man, capable of carrying arms, should take them up at the first order of him who has the power of making war." Not only "citizens" are here spoken of, but "every man capable of carrying arms." Again, in a succeeding section: "As every citizen or subject is bound to serve the State, the sovereign has a right to enlist whom he pleases." Again: "No person is naturally exempt from taking up arms in defence of the State, the obligation of every member of society being the same. Those alone are excepted who are incapable of handling arms, or supporting the fatigues of war. This is the reason why old men, children, and women, are exempted." Thus the rule is universally comprehensive. "Those alone are excepted who are incapable of handling arms." Such is the rule laid down by writers on public law. If those writers are authority, in respect to the right of the State to property, why not equal authority in respect to the right of the State to the service of persons? "No person is naturally exempt." It is manifest that those who penned the Constitution had this writer distinctly in view; and is it not obvious, that the expression persons, so repeatedly used to designate the slaves, was a word, not of chance, but of choice, perfectly understood in its relation to the "common defence?"

I take [said Mr. M.] the sound general principle to be, that all who live upon the soil are bound to defend the soil—that all who live under a Government are bound to defend the Government. As it relates to this description of persons, the position taken derives great weight from this consideration. The State Governments, before the Constitution was formed, unquestionably possessed the power to call those persons into service for defence. The State Governments held over them supreme control for purposes of war. But the States gave up to the General Government the executive power of making war. In this particular, no reservation was made—no class of persons exempted. It follows, as a clear and necessary consequence, that the United States have the same full and sovereign power which the States, respectively, possessed. And this argument appears to me unanswerable. Nor is this idea, that this class of persons may be called upon to defend the country, founded alone in theory. A case has been brought to our notice, by a gentleman from North Carolina, where the Continental Congress, during the Revolutionary war, called on some of the States to draw on this population for several thousand men. The right, therefore, has been exercised. In other countries, where slavery has existed, it has been frequently and commonly exercised. At the battle of Marathon the slaves were unchained from their work blocks, and placed in the ranks beside citizens. I dare say, you recollect, Sir, in the recent researches in Africa, it is stated, that Barca Gana, a Negro and a slave, commanded the forces of the Sheik of Bornou. In the celebrated historical Scottish Novels, giving a picture of the times and manners when Richard Cœur de Lion reigned,—Gurth and Wamba even wore collars with the name of their master, and yet went out to battle with him. The history of the Northern Nations of Europe is full of cases in point. We are not now considering a case of policy or expediency; but the naked question of abstract right, or constitutional power. If the right exists it might be highly expedient to exercise it at home, or on ordinary occasions. Wars, pressing, desolating wars, which have come to all nations, may come to us. Defensive war is often best carried on by offensive operations. Scipio did not defend Rome in the plains of Italy. He risked no second battle of Cannæ. Sir, he carried the war into Africa; defeated Hannibal, and saved Rome by victory before the gates of Carthage. Such may be our policy. Suppose hostilities should break out between this nation and Mexico or Colombia—which God in his mercy avert. I pray for perpetual peace between these Republics. Or admit that it should be necessary for us to carry on military operations in the West Indies. American blood has been shed there. You will remember, Sir, the attack on Havana, where many American lives were sacrificed. In either case, whether at Vera Cruz, in any portion of the Gulf of Mexico, or in the West Indies, where it might be necessary to send troops, it would, from the peculiar unhealthiness of the climate, be an awful waste of human life, if Northern soldiers were to be employed. This class of population, under such circumstances, might furnish men whose habits and constitutions would render them invaluable. The African race make excellent soldiers. Large numbers of them were with Perry, and aided to gain the brilliant victory on Lake Erie. A whole battalion, at New Orleans, was distinguished for its soldierly appearance. Docile, obedient, brave, and of great muscular powers, they are admirably adapted for military service. From these considerations I deduce these positions:

1. That slaves are not exempt by nature and fitness from military service.
2. That they are not exempt by the principles of public law.
3. That they are not exempt by usage.
4. That they are not exempt by positive constitutional provisions.

Mr. Speaker, another branch of the subject presents itself for consideration. I have said that the exemption contended for, both by the principle on which payment is demanded for this slave, and the arguments by which the demand is sustained, involve questions of the relative sacrifices and sufferings of the South, North, and West, in high and dread exigencies of pressing war. In this view it is just to inquire, what is the rule claimed to be applied to the whole free population of the country? What right or power has this General Government over the free population, including all the inhabitants of the North and West? What are the doctrines of Southern statesmen upon this subject? It is now a time of peace, and the ship sails smoothly on its mirror sea. No burthensome duty, no serious sacrifice, is now called for. But we cannot fail to recollect that we have had wars, and the principles that were then avowed. In 1814, Mr. Monroe, then acting Secretary of War, to fill the ranks of the army, brought forward his celebrated plan of classification or conscription. In that plan he proposes: "Let the free white population of the U. States, between eighteen and forty five years, be formed into classes, of 100 men each, and let each class furnish four men for the war, within thirty days after the classification, and replace them in the event of casualty." Again, "If any class fails to provide the men required of it, within the time specified, they shall be raised by draft on the whole class." In support of this plan, Mr. Monroe says: "Congress have a right, by the Constitution, to raise regular armies, and no restraint is imposed in the exercise of it, except in the provisions which are intended to guard, generally, against the abuse of power, with none of which does this plan interfere. It is proposed that it shall operate on all alike: that none shall be exempted from it, except the Chief Magistrate of the United States, and the Governors of the several States." "It would be absurd to suppose that Congress could not carry this plan into effect, otherwise than by accepting the voluntary services of individuals. It might happen that an army could not be raised in that mode, whence the power would have been granted in vain. The safety of the State might depend on such an army." Again, "The idea that the United States cannot raise a regular army in any other mode than by accepting the voluntary services of individuals, is believed to be repugnant to the uniform construction of all grants of power, and equally so to the first principles and leading objects of the Federal compact. An unqualified grant of power gives the means necessary to carry it into effect. This is an universal maxim, which admits of no exception." True, the plan proposes only to take "the free male population." If others are exempted, it is evidently only from expediency, not on grounds of right. The principle asserted, includes all, in its broadest and most unlimited sense, admitting, "no exception." Such are the doctrines of a distinguished citizen of Virginia, who has since been elevated to the highest seat of honor and confidence in the nation. But let us advance, in this examination, a step further. In ten days after this letter was transmitted to Congress, the Committee on Military Affairs, of which Mr. Troup, recently Governor of Georgia, was chairman, reported a bill for filling the ranks of the regular army. The first section provides for the classification of the free white male population, as proposed by Mr. Monroe; the word "white" having been added by the Committee. The section provides, "That, within — days after the classification aforesaid, each class shall furnish, for the service of the United States, an able bodied recruit, between the years of eighteen and forty-five, to serve during the war; who shall be delivered to the assessor, or marshal, or his deputy, to be by him delivered to the officer of the United States, authorized by the Department of War, to receive him," &c. Peace came, and the bill, of course, was not finally acted on. But, I deem this letter of Mr. Monroe, and the bill reported by Mr. Troup, as of very great importance in the argument, as they go to show their sentiments of the extent of the war-making power of the General Government. The letter of Mr. Monroe proposes to include, in its classification, free male persons: the bill reported by Mr. Troup exempts the black population, on grounds of expediency, it is fairly to be presumed, as Mr. Monroe, on the same grounds, had exempted, in his plan, the slaves.

How, then, stands the claim of right, on the part of this Government, as asserted by eminent Southern statesmen, over the population of the North and West, under the war-making power? Is the right claimed that the father may be taken—that the widow's son may be taken—that the master and the apprentice may be taken—that the bridegroom, not permitted the exemption of the Jewish law, may be forced from the arms of his newly wedded bride—not enlisted—not taken by consent—but forced into the service—taken by conscription—for the year, and the year in advance—not by consent, but by force—placed under martial law—under officers not of their choice, but strangers to them—marched to the swamps of Florida, or to the Rocky mountains! Is such the claim over the whole inhabitants of the free States, and is it insisted that there exists a class of privileged persons, elsewhere, wholly exempt from this dread power? The points now discussed, are not points of expediency, but of naked, dread, sovereign power. Sir, I do not think gentlemen ought to press us to settle this great question. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. When the time comes that the matter must be settled, let it then be met by those whose imperious duty it may be. It does not seem to me that any such necessity now exists. Why should we be pressed to make concessions, directly or indirectly, that this exemption exists? It appears to me it would be unjust to the North and West, that such principle of exemption should be established. By letting this bill rest, nothing is lost on either side; no principle is settled. To urge this matter, and to press the principles on which this bill is supported, are calculated to sow the seeds of bitterness far and wide. If the North and West have given themselves up, without limit, to the General Government, for the purpose of war, is it indeed true that the South has reserved a part, a large portion, of her population, from that power? Is the right to a man's slave more sacred than the right to himself? Is the claim of the Southern master over his slave of a more sacred nature than that of a father to his son, or master to his apprentice? I do not compare the slave to the son or apprentice; but I contend that the slave is entitled to no pre-eminence or exclusive privilege. What is the connexion of master and slave? How is it founded, that it should be of so superior a sacredness and character? The master and the apprentice are connected by relations founded in justice, mutual utility, and the general good. The master may have taken the lad when young, poor, ignorant. He may have fed him, clothed him—nursed him in sickness, instructed him at vast expense, to be useful. At the age of eighteen, when the mind begins to expand, and the form has gained the strength of manhood—just at the moment when the apprentice has become useful, and is able to repay the master for his care and expenditures in his behalf, you come in and take him into the public service. Is not the master's claim sacred to his services? Is it not consecrated by mutual agreement—common interest—the public good, and the sanction of law? Is not the master impoverished by the loss of his services, as much as the master of a slave, by his loss? Do you pay for the apprentice if he be slain in battle? Wherein is the right of the slaveholder, by moral or legal obligation, more just than that of the master of an apprentice? You claim the right to take, by force, into your service, the only son of the widow. In lonely sorrow she has raised him by daily toil, from an infant, cheered by the hope that, with filial piety, he would requite her kindness, and sustain her declining years. Neither tears nor prayers avail—she has no means of providing a substitute. He falls, or returns wasted and broken by disease, a burthen, instead of a blessing to her old age. Is it your doctrine that he may be forced into the army, and that there are, in another quarter, near half a million of able bodied men, withheld from your power—too sacred for the reach of your laws, wholly exempt from the duties of defence? Payment for a slave, killed in battle, can be claimed as property, only on the ground, that Government has no power over his person, as it claims to have over all other persons, for the common defence. If Government has such power, then the slave must, of course, follow the condition of all other persons, and is no more a charge to your Treasury, if slain, than other soldiers, the loss of many of whom, in a pecuniary point of view, would be infinitely more heavily felt.

If this doctrine of exemption be correct, then have you power to arrest the whole productive labor of the North and West: for there your authority, as set forth by Southern Statesmen, is absolute and unlimited; while a large portion of the productive industry of the South, is sacred from your touch. Will it be maintained, as a principle in your Constitution, that all the laborers of the free States, without any exception, in the high and dread exigencies of war, may be called from their employment: the loom still; the anvil silent; the plough rusting in the furrow; the fields barren and unproductive; while four-fifths of the laborers of the South are at their peaceful employment, undisturbed by the din of war; your Southern fields waving with rich harvests; wealth flowing in a thousand streams into the laps of their masters? These are solemn questions to us, deeply affecting our interests. Sir, I deprecate this discussion, and regret that it should have been forced upon us. But in behalf of the farmer, and manufacturer, and mechanics, whom I represent, I do protest against the establishment of the doctrines contended for. Varying the remark of a gentleman, who spoke a few days since, let me ask: Suppose it had been proposed, when the Constitution was formed, by those who held slaves, that they should be represented, but be wholly exempt from the duties of defending the soil, however great the emergency; think you, Sir, such a clause could have been ratified? I presume there can be but one voice in reply.

What, then, Mr. Speaker, is the true principle which governs the case? I apprehend it to be this: That, for the safety of all, all owe personal services, in case of necessity. This is the supreme, pervading law of civil society. All contracts are made, and all relations in society exist, subordinate to this general, all pervading, supreme law. The master takes his apprentice, as he exists himself, subject to this silent, but ever existing principle. All persons exist subject to it. The master himself is not exempt, and holds his slave under the dominion of this supreme rule. Supreme, because it is necessary for the safety of the State. In the language of Mr. Monroe, "there is no exception." I am now speaking of naked power and absolute right. In practice there are many exceptions, claimed upon principles of the most impressive character, of the highest expediency. Women are excepted; those of advanced or tender age. Persons conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms; ministers of the Gospel; judicial officers; persons whom it would be dangerous to arm. In the ordinary course of things, there is not much difficulty in practice. Mr. Speaker, I would be among the last to violate that manifest law of prudence which makes it inexpedient to look to slaves, on ordinary occasions, for soldiers. There is no feeling in my breast towards the South but that of kindness. I would neither injure their feelings nor encroach upon their rights. Pennsylvanians, under our gallant Wayne, have marched to the defence of the South, shed their blood freely, and would, if necessary, do so again. War always brings cases of individual hardship and private loss, which the Government cannot redress or assume. It is a rule of war, if an enemy get possession of your town, and, in retaking it, you destroy the house of a citizen, though your own act, the Government is not liable to make good the loss. In my judgment, the Committee of Claims acted with great wisdom in rejecting the claim for the negro, in the prudent terms of their report.

In conclusion, Sir, I cannot give my sanction to the principle which would take the farmer and mechanic of Pennsylvania to defend a Southern city from an invading enemy, risking poverty and death in your defence; and if one of your slaves in the battle shall be slain, that you may send the tax gatherer to such farmer and mechanic, if he should chance to survive, demanding of him aid in payment for such slave. I cannot admit the doctrine that all slaves who may fall in defending the homes of their masters are of right a charge upon the public treasury.

Mr. BARNARD succeeded, and spoke to the following effect; I must now ask the indulgence of the House while I explain, as briefly as I am able, the reasons that will govern me in my vote on the bill for the relief of D'Auterive. Perhaps I should have done this when the subject was in Committee of the whole, or before the House, on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GURLEY.] Sir, I was about to do so immediately before the question was taken on that amendment, and should have done so, could I have summoned to my aid assurance enough to rise for discussion amid the loud and repeated calls of "question," which came from every part of the House. As it is, I cannot record my vote against the claims of D'Auterive, as I feel myself compelled to do, without accompanying that vote with my reasons for it. Gladly would I relieve myself from the labor of addressing the House, and the House from the trouble of hearing me; and I would do so, could I refer to the remarks of any gentleman who has, at any time, taken the floor against this claim, as comprehending and explaining, with sufficient accuracy, the view which I entertain of the subject. But I cannot. And I must now add another, [Mr. MEXX who had just taken his seat] to the number of those who have addressed the House against this claim, with whose general view of the subject I cannot agree, though I do certainly agree with them all in many particulars.

It will be observed, that there are several items of claim embraced in this bill; in relation to all of which, with one single exception, I desire now to give no opinion whatever. The one item to which I allude, and to the insertion of which in the bill I must now vote against the whole claim, is the item of damages for injuries done to the person of the slave of D'Auterive.

I agree perfectly with the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just addressed the House, [Mr. MIXER] that, in the discussion of this subject, several questions have been argued very much at length, which are nearly, if not wholly, impertinent and unnecessary. Such, in my opinion, is the question, whether the impressment of private property into the public service, by the commander of an army, in time of war, is legal or illegal? Such is also the question, whether the evidence before us shews that this slave went into service by impressment, or by contract with his master? And such, I agree with the same gentleman, is the question, whether slaves are or are not property?

Sure I am, that gentlemen will agree with me that, had the discussion of these questions been avoided, this House would have escaped an excitement which is always to be deprecated. But I am not sure, that, even with these questions untouched, I shall be able to lay my hand so gently upon the subject, as not to wake anew the vibrations of some tender chord—I hope it may not be an angry one. And, whatever opinion may be entertained of the correctness of the view which I am about to present to the House, I earnestly offer this single prayer to the candour and liberality of gentlemen who may not agree with me, that they will do me the justice to believe, that my sentiments on this subject are honest sentiments; that they have been formed after the most patient deliberation; and that I cherish them the more, because, though I may find myself deceived, I hold them to be such as ought not to offend the most fastidious holder of this species of property, called slaves.

Sir, a just claim presented to this House needs no precedent to support it; and if the claim be not meritorious, no precedent can sanction it. The better way to judge of this item of claim to which I have referred, as in all similar cases, is to strip it of every embellishment, and to look at it as it stands by itself, in a naked statement of the case. D'Auterive was the owner of a slave called Warwick. In time of war, the commander of an army made a requisition for assistance in throwing up defences, in the face of the enemy. Under this requisition, Warwick was put to service, and, while in that service, received two wounds from the enemy's guns—one in the eye, the other on the arm; by means of which, his value to his master was, and is, lessened two hundred dollars. This is a plain and simple statement of the case; and upon it arises this plain and simple question—shall the Government pay the master the damages which he has sustained, through the personal injury done to his slave?

I am not aware that any one can object to any want of fairness in making the statement, or putting the question. And, in order to disembarass the question of every thing which is not essential to its decision, so as to leave it, if possible, to be determined by one individual consideration, I propose to begin by making to gentlemen who advocate this claim certain important admissions, for the sake of the argument—some of which will accord with my real sentiments, and some of which will not; and I shall endeavour to accommodate these admissions to the views of such gentlemen, however various and unsettled those views may be among themselves.

In the first place then: I have not understood distinctly whether all who have advocated this claim, contend for the legality of impressment—I mean of property: for I shall speak of the impressment of men by and by. And while I am now talking of impressment, I beg to be understood as meaning the impressment of property—I say I do not understand that all the friends of this bill contend for the legality of impressment. To such as do, for the purpose of this argument, I admit its legality. To such as hold the contrary doctrine, as being necessary to the success of this claim, I admit its illegality. But I owe it to candor to say, that I make these admissions, inasmuch as, in my view, it is totally immaterial, because irrelevant, whether the impressment of property be legal or illegal.

Again: I believe that most of the advocates of this claim have contended that Warwick was impressed into the service. To such, I concede the fact that he was impressed. If, however, there are any who prefer to put this claim on the ground of contract, to such I concede the fact that the services of the slave were contracted for. And I confess, were I the advocate of this claim, I should prefer the latter ground.

Again: To the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVANS] and whom I am proud to call my friend, and from whom I am sorry to differ in opinion on this or any other subject—to him I concede that slaves, so far as the law makes them property at all, are a species of property within the meaning of the fifth article of the amendment of the Constitution; which declares "that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

Again: I admit, cheerfully, unreservedly admit—and in accordance with my real sentiments, as well as for the sake of the argument—that slaves are property. I admit it, both as an abstract proposition, and as a practical fact. I admit it, too, for the precise reason given by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] who addressed the House in the early stage of the debate on this subject, "that that is property which the law makes property;" and of course I admit, not only that slaves are property but that they are precisely that kind and quality of property which the law constitutes them—and no other.

It will be observed, then, that, though I admit these important facts and principles, namely: that slaves are property, as constituted by law; that private property cannot be taken for public use, without just compensation; that this slave was impressed into the public service; and that the impressment of property is so far legal that it ought to be paid for; yet, with all these admissions, in my humble judgment, we have not advanced one step towards the affirmative of the question, whether the Government ought to pay the master for the damage he has sustained through the personal injury done to his slave.

Sir, I have had occasion to remark before, but on a very different subject, and I am not sure that the remark, even then, was original with me, that names are not things; and we often deceive ourselves when we imagine them to be so. Property is a word of familiar import; and whenever the word is pronounced in any man's hearing, he instantly, and unconsciously attaches to it a very common idea. The very book from which, in his infancy, he learned his alphabet, was his book—his property. The toys with which he amused his boyhood were his property; his watch in his pocket is his property; his house is his property; his horse is his property; and over all this, "his property," he has known and felt—aye felt—that his authority was absolute. Not only the use of it was his, but the thing itself—the very body of the property was his. If his mood were generous, he could give it away; if thrifty, he could sell it; if passionate, he could destroy it; break his toys in pieces, burn up his house, and blow out the brains of his horse. For, let me respectfully suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRYAN] that though the common law would punish a man for the abuse of his beast, yet it would not do so because it cares for the life of that beast, or because the owner has not absolute power over its being, but simply because an exhibition of wanton cruelty is offensive to public morals, and of "evil example to all others in like cases offending." A man may not burn his own house in the night time, and when it is inhabited, or at any time when it may endanger the property of others; but with some such exceptions he may, because it is his property; so a man may destroy his own horse, because it is his property, taking care to avoid wantonness and cruelty in the execution. And, with such ideas of property as I have described, dwelling in the mind, we give our assent to the proposition that slaves are property, which they certainly are, without once adverting to the distinction between them and "the beast that perisheth." And when we speak of slaves as property, we deceive ourselves, by a name, if we imagine them to be property precisely in the same sense in which the ox and the horse are property.

Some gentlemen seem to have thought that the fact that slaves are entitled to certain civil rights—meaning, I suppose, security of life and person, for I know of no other—proves that they are not property. Or, rather, perhaps, the argument was, that they are not always property, but sometimes persons. Now I hold them to be always property, and always persons. And that they are entitled to certain civil rights, is only the consequence of another fact, which I conceive lies at the foundation of the real distinction between this and every other species of property; and that fact is, that they are reasonable human beings; and I use this expression in the same sense in which it is used in the legal definition of homicide, which is, "the killing of a reasonable human being." So far, therefore, as they are animals, capable of bearing burthens, and performing service, they are property, always property; absolutely property. And at the same time, as reasonable human beings, they are men, always men; absolutely men.—Here then is the important distinction. The slave is your property, but the life of the slave is the property of him who gave it, and who made the slave, and not you, the tenant in possession of it. You may exact the services of your slave; you may keep his person; you may control his actions; you may send him to the end of the world for your profit; you may give him away; you may sell him for his market price; all of which is indubitable evidence that he is your property. But, during all this time, he may carry his life in his hand, and preserve it inviolate. If you inflict a wanton injury on his person, you must answer it to the laws of your country; and if you go farther, and touch his life, you must pass from an unenviable exaltation here—I mean that of the gibbet—to answer for the offence hereafter at the bar of an unerring Judge.

Says the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RANDOLPH] "that which the law makes property, is property." Well; and that which is made property by the law, and not otherwise, which, as property, is the creature of the law, is precisely such property as the law makes it to be. When the law constituted slaves property, it sanctioned the distinction existing in nature between this and every other species of property; and as it found them reasonable human beings, it left them so, and extended its protection to their lives and members. Sir, the law, like the grave, is a mighty leveller; at least in this country. It puts no difference between the life of the master, and the life of the slave. It sets no price upon either, because both are above, and equally above, all price. And, to guard every possible avenue of approach to that which is so dear to it—the life—it has set the same stamp of inviolability on the person of the slave from wanton attack, as it has on the person of the master. Were it otherwise, and were there really no distinction between this and every other species of property, I could see no necessity for Colonization Societies. Nobody, I believe, would think of colonizing cattle, for the mere purpose of getting rid of the overstock; we would kill them off, and burn up their carcasses. And those slave holders who complain of slave population, and its increase, as an evil, if slaves were precisely such property as cattle, would not think of colonizing the surplus of this population. No—they would send forth, and slay all the children, "from two years old and under," and repeat the operation as often as there were children to slay, regardless of the "lamentation in Rama;" and they would knock every old man on the head, who had not only become useless, but served only now to consume a portion of that bread which formerly the sweat of his brow had moistened—an operation which would soon bring the slave population within sufferable limits, and, if necessary, to the point of extermination. Let me not be misunderstood. I put forth this idea merely in illustration of a fact; and surely no one will be so unjust as to impugn my motives, when I add my solemn conviction and belief, that slaves in this country are universally treated by their masters with the utmost humanity and kindness.

I have now explained my view of the creature called a slave. He is the property of his master, and precisely such property as the law makes him, and no other. I look upon him as having, and always having, two distinct qualities, which are consistent with each other, if for no other reason, because the law makes them so—the quality of the property, and the quality of humanity. I use this latter term as signifying his nature, not his temper. And, wherever these qualities come in collision, the quality of humanity is the paramount quality, for the reason that both nature and the law make it so, and the quality of property must yield to it. In other words, though the slave is the absolute property of the master, yet the master must always so use his property in the slave, as not to violate his quality of human nature. And the enjoyment of this species of property is, and always must be, subject to the immunities of the slave as a human being. I am not aware that any master can contend for more.

Now, what are the immunities of the slave? Security of life, and inviolability of person from wanton injury; and the right of property in him is always to be exercised by the master, or by any body else, in subjection to these immunities. And, hence, I affirm, that the master cannot, by contract, put his slave into the service of the country, in the face of an enemy, against his will; nor can any officer of the Government impress the slave into such service.

Sir, I shall enter into no argument on the subject of impressment. I cannot agree with the gentleman who has just set down, [Mr. MIXER] in his remarks on this point. If the laws of war justify the impressment of property, on which I now give no opinion, they do not justify the impressment of men. I do not understand the report read by the gentleman to whom I have just alluded, as claiming any such power. That report claims that the Government by a law of Congress, can, if necessary, call out the whole physical force of the country; but not that men may be impressed into the public service without the warrant of law. But, on this subject, I shall content myself, by leave of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BUNNEN] with a reference to that gentleman's unanswerable demonstration, that however it may be with property, men cannot be impressed: simply adding, that they cannot be impressed, because of the inviolability of person and life; and this inviolability belongs equally to the slave and the master.

And how is it with the right of the master to put thi
